GOV. OSBORN'S FIRST MESSAGE

Is Full of Interesting and Progressive Recommendations

AS WAS EXPECTED OF THE GOVERNOR

Would Give People Right of Initiative and Recall.

Rape Constitutional Convention—Goes After Saloons—Other Important Features of the Message.

The following are the most important recommendations of the governor's message:

He expresses faith in citizenship.
Gives the average official credit for the same sincerity he claims for himself.

Says men, women and children are the state's best assets.

Wants a general investigation of state institutions so he can know conditions immediately.

Will go slow in using the veto power.

Wants the legislators to have fewer employees and to work six days a week themselves so as to have a shorter session.

Says "express rates are irregular, excessive, unfair, unreasonable slight consideration given the people." Wants them regulated.

Wants railroad fares in the upper peninsula reduced from three to two and one-half cents a mile.

Says the public should not bear the burden of overcapitalization.

Wants a bi-partisan tax commission.

Wants an expert to examine mining property.

Recommends a specific tax on mining royalties.

Says owners of ships have them taxed "where a good bargain for practical taxation can be driven with a complaisant supervisor," and recommends a specific tax.

Recommends a graduated income tax on credits (notes, etc.) in place of assessing them.

He says taxes on mortgages is double taxation and wants tax abolished.

Suggests a tentative plan for substituting a corporate income tax for all state taxes except on public service corporations. His plan for this is not fully worked out but he wants the legislature to consider it.

Wants the state to take charge of a workman's insurance fund to be paid laborers or families of laborers injured in their occupations.

Wants stringent inspection laws for mines and factories—taken out of politics.

Would give people right of initiative on a ten per cent petition and take veto power away from legislature.

Says constitutional convention was dominated by corporation lawyers.

Says "The saloon is a social sapro-phyte" (a saprophyte is a plant that grows on decaying vegetable matter.)

Says "Government by saloon and rule by brewery must go."

Says "local option is good, and out of it can come improved conditions."

Wants saloons limited to one to each 1,000 population, and brewers prohibited from owning them.

Recommends higher license and more attention to character of men running saloons.

Would have commission study the question.

Would have a less number of appeals to higher courts on techni-calties.

Wants governor and other state officers elected to a four-year term, and the people have the power to recall a faithless official.

Says the National Guard is too heavy with gold lace and about equal to a militia.

Wants the National Guard to be reorganized on a militia basis.

Wants the National Guard to be

cities of less than 40,000.

NINE DIRECTORS ARE ELECTED

At the Annual Meeting of Charlevoix Board of Commerce

HELD AT COURT HOUSE MONDAY

Directors Will Elect Officers Next Monday

Advertising Booklet to Be Issued—Secretary's Report an Interesting Document—Financial Statement.

The annual meeting of the Charlevoix Board of Commerce was held Monday evening. The following directors were elected:

One year; G. W. Croner, L. S. See,
W. H. Miller. Two years; John Burns, A. F. Bridge, D. S. Payton.

Three years; W. E. Hampton, Harry Nicholls, R. B. Armstrong.

It was decided to issue an advertising booklet in connection with the other boards of trade in the county if possible, if not, Charlevoix will issue its own booklet.

The secretary's report follows:
To The Members of the Charlevoix Board of Commerce:

I hand you herewith my annual report, in accordance with the requirements of the By-Laws.

The financial statement attached will show what funds have been received, and how disbursed. Considerable of the expenditure was for 1909, almost one-half of the total being for the Great Lakes cement factory and Boy City deals, for expenses in connection therewith which the board in charge in 1908-9 incurred. The largest individual expenditure the past year was $75 for resort advertising. The result was most satisfactory, as far as replies were concerned, as the secretary received between three and four hundred inquiries and had to write that many persons letters in reply, as we had no booklets or other advertising to send out. If further resort advertising is to be indulged in, it is very important that we have some sort of a booklet to send out in response to inquiries.
We have the cuts on hand, and a very satisfactory booklet could be gotten out for much less than the original one.

Collection of dues has not been satisfactory. It would hardly seem necessary for the officer whose duty it is to receive the money, to make a collection agency of himself, and chase delinquents about the street to coax them to pay.
Every man who holds stock, is well aware of his obligation to settle,
and the official notice should be sufficient. But it does not seem to be, in many instances. There are a number in arrears, who will, I am sure pay up in full in time, as soon as temporary embarrassments disappear, and all book-keepers will come. It is necessary, however, that all will have sufficient notice of their obligation to pay.

all will have sufficient notice of their obligation to pay.

Collection of dues has not been satisfactory. It would hardly seem necessary for the officer whose duty it is to receive the money, to make a collection agency of himself, and chase delinquents about
the street to coax them to pay.
Every man who holds stock, is well aware of his obligation to settle,
and the official notice should be sufficient. But it does not seem to be, in many instances. There are a number in arrears, who will, I am sure pay up in full in time, as soon
as temporary embarrassments disappear, and all book-keepers will come. It is necessary, however, that all will have sufficient notice of their obligation to pay.

PRODUCTION OF BROILERS.

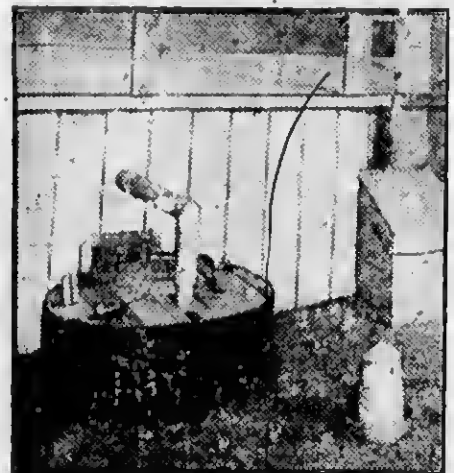

Money in These Choice Poultry Products if Well Handled.

The production of broiler chickens in the season when they are supposed to be the choicest and most correct article on the menu is a very special branch of the poultry industry, says Farm Progress.

The "spring chicken" at the same age and of the same weight does not rank with the high priced "broiler" of the midwinter months, and the rearing of the latter requires especial conveniences and special care.

It is not a branch of the business adapted for general following, and before making arrangements to engage in it the grower should be secured in one or more of the large cities, and the production to be profitable must be in very considerable numbers.

Broiler chickens are between three and four months old and must each weigh from one to one and a half pounds, live weight, and at this age should be plump and symmetrical with white flesh when dressed. For this purpose the white or buff breeds of the American or English races are STERIOR OF GOOD BROILER HOUSE. To be preferred to any of the Asiatic breeds on account of their more rapid maturity.

Shading and weather proof houses must be provided, but except in very cold climates no arrangements for artificial heating need be made in addition to those for warming the brooders.

The chickens are necessarily hatched in incubators, as during late September and October, when the eggs are set, the hens are mostly molting and, even if some show broodiness, are not in condition to be hatching and hovering young. Incubators and brooders, the former of the most improved patterns, are to be selected and their management experimented with and thoroughly mastered.

Quite a large number of brooders will be required, but some of these, designed for the chickens when quite well grown, many of the fireless sort or of home construction, to be warmed with jars of hot water which, when well wrung out, will retain their heat for many hours.

Late hatched chicks become quite hardy, and when well reared and properly fed are not subject to any of the diseases to which summer chickens are liable.

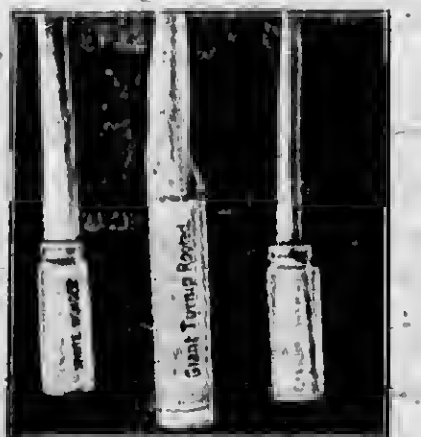

They will not need much range, but on warm, clear days may be permitted to exercise for a few hours on the lawn or in a wire fenced yard upon which the houses open, and on such days all the brooders ought to be stabled for several hours.

Of course the strictest cleanliness in all the appendages as well as in the food and water must be observed, and if the houses are new or have been thoroughly disinfected there will be no insect pests of any kind. The first broiler chickens often sell for $1 a pound and later seldom for less than $5 per dozen.

SAVING PLANT LABELS.

Directions For Using Small Glass Bottles For This Purpose.

In endeavoring to secure a permanent label which would be at the same time cheap and easily prepared the following plan was hit upon, says a correspondent of House and Garden. First secure a sufficient number of small bottles with corks. The small tubes that prepared photographic developers come in will do, or the one or two small household vials may be secured at your drug store. Wire and some small stakes with one end trimmed down to fit the necks of the bottles complete the equipment. Copper binding wire is best, as it is very pliable and does not corrode when exposed to the weather.

For the seed bed clip from the end of the seed package the strip bearing the name of the variety planted. Slip this into the bottle, cork tightly and wire to a stake at the end of the row, or if desired the bottle may be slipped over the end of the stake, as shown in the accompanying photograph. For trees, shrubs, etc., the bottle inclosing a label written with indelible ink may be wired to a branch, twisting the wire tightly around the neck of the bottle and leaving a long loop for the branch. Labels attached in this way may be left in place for years with no danger of injury to the branch to which it is attached.

USEFUL CONTRIVANCE.

Easily Constructed Space Saving Feed Box For the Horses.

As the space on the first floor of the horse barn is often limited, any device that will enlarge it without expense is worth having. A farmer in Woodbury, Conn., has put in a handy, inexpensive fixture that is useful the year through. It is described thus in the Orange Judd Farmer:

He built his big out in the loft, dined it carefully to keep out mice and connected a galvanized iron tender pipe to the bottom of it, leading this down to a place near the stable door where a box was nailed up with a cover. This cover can be opened but will not stay open. The oats flow down, partly fill this box and stop because the bottom of the chute is covered. It is easy for the busy teamster to dip out what he desires to feed. This chute will conduct oats, wheat, barley or any whole grain, but clogs with ground feed.

To put up the leader is a quick and easy job, for a three inch leader comes in two foot lengths that are just right, and the allows are made with tight but movable joints that may be turned in any direction, permitting the worker to follow around a post if necessary. As the joints fit tightly into one another, no soldering is needed.

One Shrewd Farmer's Work.

It is a common rule pretty generally observed that the farmers in this country lose more money than they taxes each year by not cutting the alfalfa along their ditch banks, says the Denver Field and Farm. We know a man who last fall secured permission to cut the alfalfa on the ditch banks of a neighboring ranch. He cut it with a scythe and put in three days and a half cutting and stacking it. He then had the little stack threshed and sold the seed for $108. This is pretty good for the time put on the job.

Keep Your Tools Sharp.

One of the hardest things for the average farmer to do is to keep sharp tools about the premises, such as spades, hoes, saws and chisels. I have found, since putting a workbench in the corner of a building and equipping it with a vise that it is much easier to sharpen everything that can be sharpened with a file. A little workshop of a work corner in some building should be a part of every farm.—Iowa Homestead.

Orchard and Garden.

Clean tillage. Everybody believes in it, but few practice it.

Raspberry plants affected with crown gall should be dug out and burned. There is no cure.

Where orchards are kept in grass, the grass should be mowed and left to lie in place under the trees to rot.

A neat, clean, well painted and lettered market wagon attracts attention and helps to sell produce at good prices.

If the leaves of your apple and peach trees show dark green and the growth is vigorous, you know that the soil is all right.

The soil for the apple orchard must be thoroughly drained. It will not do to let the water stand about the roots of the trees.

Apple trees do best at a distance of two rods each way, unless it is a variety that tends to grow upward rather than outward.

Placing a small heap of rich stable manure around the base of each tree in the orchard will prove to be a little time most profitably spent.

It costs money to step on a ladder, as an orchard owner soon finds, and all that can reasonably be done by pruning to start the head of the trees low and keep it low is paying investment.

The good roads movement increases the pleasure of moving over the roads.

Brute Strength. If men were relatively as strong as brutes they could juggle with weights of several tons.

TURKEY CARVING POINTERS.

How the Thanksgiving Bird Can Be Dismembered Gracefully.

When carving the Thanksgiving bird it is not often necessary to cut up the whole body of the turkey. But where every scrap of the meat will be needed, or you wish to exercise your skill, proceed to carve in this manner:

Put the fork in firmly across the middle of the breastbone. Cut through the skin between the leg and body. Bend the leg over and cut off at the joint. If the turkey be very tender or overcooked the side bone will separate from the back and come away with the second joint, making it more difficult to separate the thigh from the side bone. Cut through the tip of the shoulder and separate the wing at the joint. Cut off the leg and wing from the other side. Carve the breast on each side in thin slices, standing slightly toward the wing. Be careful to take a portion of crisp outside with each slice. Shave off the crisp skin near the neck in order to reach the stuffing. Insert the point of the knife at the front of the breastbone, turn back the wishbone and separate it. Cut through the cartilage on each side, separating the collar bones from the breast. Turn the body slightly over and slip the knife under the end of the shoulder blade; turn it over toward the wing. Repeat this process on the opposite side. Cut through the cartilage which divides the ribs, separating the breastbone from the back. Lay the breast one side and remove the fork from it.

Take the stuffing from the back. Turn the back over, place the knife midway just below the ribs and with the fork lift up the tail end, separating the back from the body. Place the fork in the middle of the backbone and cut close to the backbone from one end to the other on each side, freeing the side bone. Then divide the legs and wings at the joints. The joint in the leg is not quite in the middle of the head, but a trifle nearer the thigh. If required, some practice to strike those joints in the right spot. Cut off the meat from each side of the bone in the second joint and leg, as these, when large, are more than one person requires, and it is inconvenient to leave so large bones on one's plate.

It is easier to finish the carving before beginning to serve. An expert carver will have the whole bird disjointed and literally in pieces with a very few strokes of the knife.—Mrs. D. A. Lincoln in "Carving and Sewing."

TIPS FOR FISHERMEN.

How to Preserve Fish by Packing Them in Paper.

The following method of preserving fish, originated by the Danish fisheries agent in London, England, although meant for commercial fishermen and fish dealers, will be none the less interesting and valuable to sportsmen.

The main point in the preservation, writes Consul General Wallace C. Boyd of Copenhagen in Recreation, appears to be to inclose the fish in some cheap and convenient material which will keep out the air and prevent the intrusion of injurious aerial bacteria.

By this method of packing the fish in paper before placing them on crushed ice the air is excluded and the ice water is prevented from reaching the fish. The effect of the ice through the paper prevents the development of any bacteria that might be already in the fish. In order to attain this result it is absolutely necessary that the fish be treated while alive, or at least when quite fresh, and it is therefore better to undertake the treatment on board the fishing boats.

The fish should be cut while it is yet alive, the insides removed and the gills cut away. The head, however, ought always to be left. The second, where such is found, is cut through lengthwise and all the blood under it is removed. The fish must be cut so far back that all the blood accumulated at the anus can easily be removed. The fish is then cleaned and scrubbed well in salt water, inside as well as out, with a stiff brush until all the blood stains are removed.

As soon as the fish has lain long enough for all the blood to run off (it must be carefully observed that no bloody water remains in the belly) the fish is packed in the paper, which must be square in order to obtain the best packing and each side at least one and one-half times the length of the fish.

HARDWOOD FLOORS.

How to Acquire One of Successfully Polished Oak.

The two principal hard woods used for floors are maple and oak. Of them the latter is in more common use for all kinds of floors. To achieve a successfully polished oak floor is by no means a simple and easy process, but the result is well worth the expenditure of labor and money, since it is practically indestructible and improves in appearance with age.

Oak flooring leaves the factory in perfect condition. It has been kiln dried, tongued and grooved and end matched. The care of the lumber after it reaches the builder's hands is of the greatest consequence to the success of the floor. It should be protected from moisture and from rough handling such as may have the surface. After it has been laid the next process is that of smoothing. The lumber is, of course, smoothed before it is laid, but it will nevertheless require a more minute process of scraping in order to remove the "waves" which slight differences in the quality of the boards will give rise to. This process is one of the most important, save after the finish is put on imperfections will show up even more glaringly than before. Every housewife knows of the small rough patches in a bare floor which gather dirt and which it is impossible to clean.

During the process of scraping the part of the floor which has been finished should be covered so as to be protected from footprints and any other possible injury to the surface. It is much better if possible to have the floor laid and finished after the carpeting and painting are all done so that it will not be necessary to walk on the floor. This makes them somewhat more expensive, however.

After the scraping and smoothing processes are completed, the floor should have a coat of a paste filler. This filler is rubbed thoroughly into the wood, and then the superfluous paste is removed. This paste filler may be incorporated with coloring matter, and in this manner any one of a variety of tones may be given to the floor. After the filler has dried the finishing process is completed by the application of one, two and sometimes three coats of varnish, each one being allowed to dry before the next one is applied. Floor varnishes nowadays have been improved until they do not crack or show foot prints if a good quality is employed.

GOOD THINGS FOR WINTER.

How to Make Tomato Butter and Citron Marmalade.

Tomato butter has not the insidious sweetness of ordinary fruit butters and therefore can be used much more freely. It can be spread over bread with or instead of butter, and in one household at least it has materially reduced the butter bill. It also makes a delicious substitute for catsup with cold meats at luncheon. The recipe calls for three pounds of peeled and minced tomatoes, two cups of brown sugar, three-quarters of a cupful of vinegar, two teaspoonsful of salt, two of cinnamon and one of cloves. Let the mixture boil down until very thick and then seal up in sterilized pint jars.

To make citron marmalade put three quarts of the fruit carefully washed on the stove with two pints of sugar and a scant half pint of vinegar. Add salt, cinnamon and cloves to suit the taste, using about half as much cloves and cinnamon and having one-half the spices powdered and the other half whole. Cook the pickle very slowly on the back of the stove for several hours so that each little tomato will preserve its shape and will be perfectly tender and thoroughly permeated with the spices. It is cooked quickly the tomatoes will be likely to fall apart and make an unsightly looking dish. The spices should be used liberally.

A reliable recipe for preserved citron marmalade calls for half a pound of sugar, one lemon and a big spoonful of raisins to every pound of citron. After weighing the citron peel it cut it into chunks and put it into boiling water, just barely enough to cover it. While the fruit is boiling add the sugar and lemon and then when tender stir the raisins through it and seal in glass jars that have been properly sterilized.

How to Stand in a Car.

A Brooklyn (N. Y.) man who probably speaks from long experience gives advice upon how to maintain equilibrium when compelled to stand in a car.

"Many persons," he says, "sway backward and forward as well as from side to side. This often throws them into awkward positions, especially when carrying parcels, which make strain, headache, impracticable. To overcome this difficulty one should place the feet seven or eight inches apart and one a little behind the other, say about three inches, with the toes pointing out. I have seen business men reading newspapers and standing in this way when riding to and from work with little more inconvenience than if standing on solid ground."

How to Keep Grapes.

In one of the grape regions in New Jersey baskets of bunches of the fruit are kept fresh by picking every imperfect grape from the stem and then dipping the cut ends of the bunch in sealing wax and placing it in a thin paper box, sealing the bag securely and hanging it in such a way that the bunch will be suspended without weight on the fruit. The bags are kept in a very cool, dry place.

How to Care For Boston Ferns.

Plant in a mixture of leaf-mould, loam and a little sand to make porous. Water only when the soil begins to look dry. Feed when the fern has started growing with tea made from cow manure once or twice a week. If the fern pots are set in jardinières don't let the water settle or it will sour soil. Sprinkle once in awhile. A shower bath of a piece of raw meat once a month is a good fertilizer. Ferns rest in winter and in March begin to rest, then in October begin to rest. Feed tea only in growing months, March or April to October.

How to Clean Sofa Pillows.

A potato is a potato this fall, with retail prices ranging around $1.40 per bushel now and the prospects good that seed potatoes no larger than banty eggs will fetch $2 or more per bushel by next April.

In spite of the popular superstition that a brown shelled egg is "richer" than a white shelled, chemical analyses of the contents of the two do not reveal any difference in quality. It is merely a notion, but nevertheless the brown egg will fetch a higher price in some localities and white eggs in others.

Time was when the Russian thistle was looked upon as almost as great a menace to agriculture as quack grass and Canada thistles, but little attention is paid to it now. It is annual and does not spread by an underground root stalk system, and if kept from seeding by cutting before the seeds mature it is easily disposed of.

Graham bread takes its name from the fact that in the year 1794 a Connecticut doctor of the name of Sylvester Graham started a crusade in favor of making bread from whole wheat or brown flour. He gave lectures and wrote books on the subject, and so much emphasis did he lay on the new bread that from that time on to the present it has been known as "graham."

If the job has not been already done it will be a good idea soon to go through the bush fruit patch and cut out the old canes. This will tend to make the new canes thrifter and harder and will simplify the work of covering the canes for the winter. If one's latitude is such that this work needs to be done. The brush and litter from the patch should be burned.

Now and then one moves into a neighborhood where the soil is good, crops are fine and climate endurable, but where one just can't get along with his neighbors and is in a rumper with some of them most of the time. Where one hasn't a pocketbook long enough to buy such neighbors out and they show no disposition to sell to other folks and more over the sensible thing is for the aggrieved party to sell and move to a more agreeable neighborhood.

The day is not here yet, but it will be ere long, when the only accepted method of handling the farm manures will be storing them carefully under a covered shed with a concrete floor, which will not only prevent their leaching in the rain, but will catch and hold all the liquid ingredients. With fresh manure worth by actual crop growing test $2.25 per ton and with more than half this value lost under the prevalent method of handling, a safer method for conserving this important by product of the farm would seem to be demanded.

Along with the very commendable policy of storing the barn full of fodder for the stock and the cellar full of fruit and vegetables for physical cheer during the long winter months, it is a very excellent idea to provide a good supply of mental cheer for the family table in the shape of popular periodicals and several wholesome books. Suited to their respective tastes and ages, there should be found in these something for the boys and girls, for the soberer parent and for grandpa and grandma. If the home is still graced with their presence, it will cost a few dollars this little to provide for the mental needs, but no money put in around the place in the way of winter supplies will have more whole some effect or be more enjoyed.

One of the few orchardists in the upper Mississippi-Missouri valley region who will this year market a crop of apples is C. E. Miner, in Fremont, the southwest county of Iowa. The "apple of the crop," which has been gathered within the past few days, is placed at close to shivers. He has this yield not by chance, but because he adopted western methods of orchard care and prevention and last spring smothered his orchard with crude petroleum in fire pots designed for the purpose. Last April during the memorable freeze a thousand oil pots were kept blazing in this orchard, and things were kept in this orchard while the thermometer registered as low as 22 degrees Fahrenheit outside. This cost a nice sum of money, but it was worth the petroleum, the returns in apple sales compensating for the outlay many times over. This man's success in the instance cited is just another example of what can be accomplished where determination and intelligence are combined to effect the accomplishment of a given object.

True, it's an old fashioned plant, but for the housewife who has little time to give to horticulture the geranium is one of the most satisfactory. It is a thrifty grower, free bloomer, no pests bother it, while if one gets slips of the finest kinds beautiful blossom effects may be secured. The requirements are rich soil and plenty of water and sunshine.

The King or dirt road drag not only gives good results when used on highways during the spring and summer, when they are in a mealy condition following a rain, but when used on slushy or muddy roads in the late fall just prior to a freeze-up. Giving them a treatment at this time smooths down the bumps and fills up the holes and runs and makes a smooth and firm foundation for the winter snow.

The fact needs emphasizing frequently that all of this effort by cereal specialists along the line of developing more prolific types of grain is of little use unless along with it go instruction and practice which will keep up the fertility of the soil so that it can produce the extra yields of grain without depletion. On any other basis increased yields of grain can mean only an accelerated exhaustion of the soil.

The reformed city dweller who is too respectable to go to the polls on election day because he "does not want to associate with the kind of men who gather there" is, if anything, a little worse traitor to the country of which he is a citizen and the free institutions of which he is a beneficiary than the farmer who is so busy he "can't spare the time to vote this year." However, the important thing to remember is that both are traitors and should be viewed as such by all right thinking people.

There is many a section where there is considerable agitation for better roads where the first step which must be taken to make good roads possible is a drainage of highway areas and territory adjacent thereto, so that the subsoil will not be in a condition of ooze seven or eight months out of the year. While such drainage may cost quite a good deal, it is well to remember that the rich lowlands just outside the highways from which the water is taken will be greatly increased in value.

Dairy Maid of Pinehurst is the name of the champion three-year-old cow of the world. In a year's milking which closed a short time ago she gave 14,000 pounds of milk, which contained 860 pounds of butter fat, or the equivalent of 1,032 pounds of commercial butter. The cow was on exhibition at some of the big state fairs and was admired by thousands. She is a Guernsey of large size, beautiful color and splendid dairy type conformation and belongs to W. W. Marsh of Waterloo, Ia.

The family boar, the pig, wild deer and occasionally game birds, like the imported pheasants, appear on the list of garden marauders, but not until the other day have we seen the snapping turtle, known to every boy who fishes for bullheads, put in this list. A Mississippi valley farmer noticed that something was raising hob with his tomato patch. He set a watch one night and found that eight or ten big snapping turtles came out of the creek by creek and feasted to their fill on his big juicy tomatoes. He also found that they had been going from these when the supply was short to his cabbage patch. It would seem about time for him to negotiate with some city cafe for soup stock.

A few nights ago a flock of sheep near where the writer lives were raided by a bunch of neighborhood curs, and next morning thirteen of the innocents were found dead and a dozen badly injured. Of course if the owner of these sheep can prove whose dogs they were who did this killing he can compel them to foot the bill of damages. If not he'll have to charge it to profit and loss. This loss for blood in the average canine is natural enough, perhaps, for it tells of the wild dog or wolf ancestry of the modern dog family and of a time when their whole bill of fare consisted of the blood and flesh of the wild animals which they ran to earth. This sheep killing streak in dogs has its parallel among mankind in the barbarian instinct which crops out now and then in mobs bent on lynching or murdering droves of bipeds that will back a notorious criminal's scaffold or outfit to pieces for grim souvenirs.

A number of people who visited the national corn show at Omaha two years ago had a taste of the alfalfa meal, cookies and cakes which were on exhibition in the Nebraska headquarters. Now comes the Texas experiment station in Lufkin No. 128 with the suggestion that finely ground cottonseed meal "may in the near future be used extensively as a protein furnishing ration in place of meat, eggs, cheese, beans, peas, etc. Experiments have been made along this line, and biscuits, cakes, cookies and bread have been made of a flour mixture containing equal parts of cottonseed meal to four parts of wheat. These products are palatable and are of a yellowish brown color, just as the alfalfa meal products were of a light olive green. It is estimated that a pound of protein from cottonseed meal costs but one-tenth of a pound of protein got from meat, while three ounces of cottonseed meal "the maximum ration recommended for an adult" furnishes as much protein as would be supplied in six ounces of meat, an average day's ration.

always with little baby. And so that's make her scare, because little baby ain't do nothing to hurt that way. Mr. Marsh he say it's all one lie, and he don't care if little baby do go to hell. You hear that? He don't care for little baby."

Constantine's eyes were full of tears as he strove laboriously to voice his religious teachings. He went on with growing agitation:

"Chakawum she's mighty scare" of that bad place, and she ask Mr. Marsh again to marry her, but he beat her. That's when I try to kill him. Mebbe Mr. Emerson ain't come so quick Mr. Marsh go to hell himself."

Wayne Wayland turned upon Marsh. "Why don't you say something?"

"I told you the brat isn't mine," he cried. "If it isn't Emerson's it's Cherry Mulotte's. They want money, but I won't be lied."

"You marry my sister?" asked Constantine.

"No," snarled Willis Marsh. "You can all go to hell and take the child with you."

Without a single warning cry the breed lunged swiftly. The others saw something gleam in his hand. Emerson jumped for him, and the three men went to the deck in a writhing tangle, sending the furniture spinning before them. Mildred heard Boyd Emerson cry to the sailors:

"Get out of the way! I've got him!"

Then saw him locked in the Indian's arms. They had gained their feet and upon backward, bringing up against the yacht's cabin with a crash of shivering glass. A knife, wrenched from the breed's grasp, went whirling over the side into the sea.

Wayne Wayland loosed his daughter's hold and thrust his way in among the sailors kneeling beside the man he had chosen for his son-in-law. Emerson joined him, then rose quickly, crying:

"Is there a doctor among your party?"

"Dr. Berry! Send for Berry! He's gone ashore!" exclaimed Mr. Wayland.

"Quick! Somebody fetch Dr. Berry," Boyd directed.

As the sailors drew apart Mildred Wayne saw a sight that made her grow dementally faint and close her eyes.

Dairy Doings. Good pastures are the cheapest cow feed, and green soiling crops are next. Don't expect a dairy cow to give satisfactory results on half rations. The half fed cow never pays.

With the dairy farmer it should not be a question of building one silo, but whether or not two should be built.

A mixture of salt, two parts, and ashes, one part, should be put in the silage box at least once each week. The ashes should be rich in charcoal. The cows require a great deal of charcoal and cannot do their best without it.

Promiscuous cross breeding never leads to desirable results. It is only by persistent clinging to the characteristics of any of the dairy breeds and by careful breeding to fix those characteristics that the herd is materially built up.

Do not suppose the cow's appetite, she knows what it takes to make a balanced ration better than any feeding standard. If she does not like run and can give oats and corn. If she is tired of fodder by all means try a little clover hay.

The thermometer should be used while churning and the temperature kept down to from 55 to 60 degrees. Conditions are favorable the butter should be granular and should require more time than from twenty to thirty minutes for churning.

A Convenient Rule. The editor of a newspaper published in a small town frequently received from one of its citizens letters on municipal affairs which were always pertinent and worthy of publication, but which were punctuated in a way that was most peculiar. Meeting his correspondent on the street one day, he said: "That was an excellent letter I received from you this morning. Uncle Hugh, and I'm going to print it in this week's paper. But, tell me, what rule do you follow for punctuation?"

"Why," replied Uncle Hugh, "the same rule as I was taught when I was a boy. I put in a semicolon every twelve words and two commas between each pair of sentences."

The COURIER wants wood on subscription.

ONLY ONE KIND OF WOOD GOOD FOR CIGAR BOX USE.

Spanish Cedar, Grown in Cuba, Yet to Be Duplicated in World.

There are more than 11,000,000 cigar boxes used in the United States every year. The wood from which the best boxes are made comes from Cuba and is known as Spanish cedar. After the war with Spain the supply of this wood was greatly diminished and its price raised so that for a time cigar dealers were obliged to find a substitute for this kind of cedar.

Various woods were tried, but trouble was found in selling these boxes, because connoisseurs insisted that a fine cigar was spoiled by putting it in any but a box made of Spanish cedar. This wood always retains the flavor of a good cigar. Indeed, it is contended in some quarters that it improves the flavor. The reason given is that it grows in the same localities as the best Havana tobacco.

Attempts to use cedar grown in the United States for cigar boxes have not been successful. The Florida and the South American cedars contain a peculiar gum that ruins when the wood is exposed to the heat of the store or house, and thus the labels and sometimes the cigars in a box are spoiled.

The smokers of cheaper brands of cigars are, of course, less particular about the quality of the wood used for their boxes, and a veneered cedar made from a peculiar sort of cedar that grows in Mexico is often substituted for the Spanish article. But it cannot be done without the cigar dealers finding it out, and the consequence is that even a good cigar when packed in such a box sells at a disadvantage.

ANOTHER LITTLE DORRIT DIES

English Woman's Brother Supposed to Have Been Tiny Tim.

The original of Dickens' Little Dorrit has just died at Southsea in the person of Mrs. Georgina Margaret Hayman. She was nearly eighty-one. Her father, Mr. Bridges, was a London solicitor and was for many years an intimate friend of Dickens. The novelist was a frequent visitor at the solicitor's house and took a keen interest in all the members of the family.

Mrs. Hayman as a girl was pretty, and all the ladies in the district made eyes at her. One day she lost one of a pair of red shoes that she used to wear, and which Dickens made use of in his works.

Mrs. Hayman's brother, who died while still a lad, is said to have inspired another of Dickens' characters, Tiny Tim. In "A Christmas Carol" the boy met with an accident while at play, being impaled on an iron railing, but he was a cheery little fellow in spite of the injury that made him a cripple. Dickens is also said to have characterized the boy as Paul Dombey, the invalid son of old Dombey.

WOODEN SCHOONER IS GIANT

Wyoming, Recently Sent Out, Beats All Records.

There is a general idea that the wooden sailing ship is a thing of the past, but there recently landed at Baltimore for its maiden voyage a wooden vessel that far outranks any that ever put to sea.

This is a six masted schooner, called the Wyoming, and is a splendid ship in every particular, with a gross register of 3,730 tons, or twenty-two tons more than the well known steel hull six masted schooner William L. Douglas of Boston.

The Wyoming is 329 feet 2 inches long, 50 feet 1 inch beam and 30 feet 4 inches depth of hold. It has three decks, with five discharging hatches, and took as its first cargo 5,822 tons of soft coal for Boston.

The frame of the huge schooner is securely strapped with iron, and its keelson is protected with big bands of sheet iron. Telephones, steam pumps, steam hoists, etc., make the vessel tip to date in every particular. The vessel cost $100,000 to build.

EXPECT MILLION STAMP SALE

Red Cross Leaders Plan Christmas Tuberculosis Campaign.

"Charity stamps," first used in Boston in 1862 for the soldiers' relief funds during the civil war, were the original forerunners of the Red Cross Christmas seal, which will be used this year to bring happiness and cheer to millions.

The Delaware Anti-tuberculosis society in 1907 for the first time in America made use of a stamp for the purpose of getting revenues to fight consumption. In a hastily organized campaign of only three weeks it realized $3,000. The next year, 1908, the American Red Cross conducted the first national tuberculosis stamp campaign. From this sale $125,000 was realized for the anti-tuberculosis movement. In 1909, under many adverse conditions, $250,000 was realized from these stamps. This year the slogan of the tuberculosis fighters and the Red Cross is, "A million for tuberculosis from Red Cross seals in 1911."

PEACH LEAF CURL.

Causes and Remedies Discussed in Cornell University Bulletin.

Bulletin 255 of the Cornell university agricultural experiment station gives the distribution, cause and control of this common disease known as the peach curl.

No peach seems immune to the disease, and most growers report that the Elberta is the most susceptible to it.

The symptoms are easily recognized. The leaves become not only abnormally swollen, thickened and distorted, but curl and become sickly yellow in color, often thick with red. After a few weeks these leaves fall from the trees, leaving severe scars leaving them nearly or quite denuded of foliage and that at a time of the year when the tree can ill afford to lose them. It is true that a new crop of leaves is soon produced, but this effort of nature to repair the loss is a heavy drain on the vitality of the tree. The disease often affects the shoots, causing them to swell and cease growth and even in some cases kills them.

This disease is caused by a fungus that lives as a parasite in the affected parts. It enters the young leaves and shoots very early in the development and opening of the bud in the spring.

(Illustration showing the curled leaves upon a young peach tree in late summer as a result of previous winter injury to the bark of the main root just below the collar. This same appearance may be brought about by yellow, borers and severe mechanical injury or girdling.—Photograph from Bulletin New Jersey Agricultural Experiment Station.)

For this reason all efforts to control it are most effective if made before the buds begin to swell in the spring.

The important factors in the control of this disease seem to be (1) time of application; (2) thoroughness and (3) the fungicide used. This statement represents also the order of importance of these three factors.

The time of the application is any time within a month before the buds begin to swell and before rain periods, not after.

The test of thorough work is to find no buds on the trees that are entirely covered with an evenly distributed coat of the spray mixture.

The fungicide may be one of several. Repeated experiments have shown that Bordeaux mixture 5-5-50 to 3-4-50 will control peach leaf curl. Lime sulphur, home boiled, or commercial concentrate of almost any brand is also equally effective.

In the orchards where there is San Jose scale it has been found that spraying for the scale with the lime sulphur also controls the peach leaf curl. This result has been verified at the Georgia experiment station, for before winter spraying became necessary to control the San Jose scale, some leaf curl was discovered in the orchards. However, as soon as regular winter spraying was practiced the leaf curl disappeared.

Poultry Pointers.

Dark pin feathers give a dirty appearance to a dressed carcass. A hen's appetite bears directly upon her egg production. Exercise gives it zest.

Shift your hens about every year or two. The chicks will do better and keep healthier.

Two kinds of chickens will do to kill—those that haven't begun to lay and those that have quit.

Let farmers take more interest in exhibiting poultry at the county and state fairs. Pure bred fowls will advertise your farm.

If you wish your hens to lay well next spring it will be advisable to provide range for them. This can be done by planting a winter crop for their benefit.

Turn the poultry into the garden, if possible, during the last fall days. If the ground is plowed let them run over it before seedling. They will destroy quantities of insects.

Sow a small piece of rye or wheat near the poultry house to give your fowls late and early greens. In very stormy weather feed equal parts of corn, wheat, oats and beef meal ground together as a mash.

Teach the boy that it is better to be a man and a farmer than to be a hand or an arm or a wheel in somebody's factory.

ADVICE FOR DOG FANCIERS.

How to Plan and Take Care of the Kennel Buildings.

Whether a kennel is run for pleasure or for profit, the investment which yields the best return is cleanliness, and the nearer the dog fancier brings his establishment to perfect aseptic conditions the greater will be his success. This, then, is the prime thing to be considered in establishing a place for the care and breeding of dogs of any type. Either unlimited money may be used to accomplish this result or a little common sense.

The points to be considered in planning kennel buildings are drainage, protection, food and water and room for exercise. The south side of a gently sloping hill offers the best site. Damp hollows must be avoided as a pestilence, and if the yards are not covered with concrete the less shade therein the better, for the sun itself is one of the best eradicators of disease germs.

The shape of the buildings matters little. If as many as ten dogs are kept it is well to build a simple wooden structure holding five or six stalls, each with a door opening upon an inner passage, a wired window for light and air and a small exit into the outer yard. The construction of one stall will serve as the model for many. It should be as large as possible, well lighted and well ventilated.

Cleanliness is always the thing. Let the whitewash brush and the disinfecting spray be used liberally. Insist on the absence of litter and provide fresh water and food of the persistent kind troubles will vanish. Dogs, as do men, thrive best under the nearest possible approach to normal conditions. They need little luxury and are better without pampering.—Todd Russell in Ontario.

A Dutch funeral in the rural districts is enough to give one the blues for a month. The hearse is draped heavily in black, and the driver wears a large black hat. Not infrequently the hearse is adorned with grinning skulls, and it is said that formerly the horses were purposely shod in a manner which would make them go lame. The funeral is always held at the close of the day and attended by a large number of the village. Food and drink being served at the house before the long, slow march to the cemetery is taken up.—Interior.

CHESTER DENTON SHOOTS HIMSELF

During Fit of Despondency Brought on by Illness.

EARLY LAST THURSDAY MORNING

Was One of the Best Known Residents of the City

Veteran of the Civil War—Had Lived in Charlevoix County Since 1868—Leaves Wife and two Children.

Thursday morning the citizens of Charlevoix were shocked on hearing that Chester Denton, one of the best known and highly respected of our old residents, had in a fit of despondency, brought on by illness, committed suicide about four o'clock that morning by shooting himself through the head.

Mr. Denton, who had been confined to the house since Sunday, got up Thursday morning and getting his revolver, went back to bed and lying down shot himself. Another shot was fired, which lodged in the wall. It is thought the second shot was caused by the grip of his hand on the trigger as his arm fell to his side, owing to the close succession of the reports.

Chester Denton was born in St. Lawrence county, New York in 1843 and served in the Civil war in Company G, 68th New York Infantry losing a leg in the service. He came to Charlevoix county in 1868 settling on a farm in Norwood, afterward moving to this city where he was engaged in the grocery business, since which he has led a retired life.

He was a member of Baxter Post and the Masonic order also the Baptist church. He leaves besides his wife, one son, Ira C. Denton of Albion, and one daughter, Mrs. E. F. Martindale of Harbor Springs, also four brothers and one sister, all of whom reside in New York state with the exception of one brother who resides in Minnesota. The funeral was held Saturday, Rev. F. Deway Elble officiating.

LOGICAL OUTLET

Charlevoix is for Michigan Central Railroad

Article From Grand Rapids Press on Railroad Matters.

Chiefly notable as the most beautiful resort spot on the east shore of Lake Michigan, Charlevoix soon may acquire fame as a transportation center through the reported determination of the Michigan Central to lay its rails into a Lake Michigan port and open up trans-lake car ferry service.

Charlevoix is the logical outlet for the Michigan Central. It would require only a few miles of track to connect its present upstate line with either of the two fine harbor propositions here and rumors will not be denied that this branch of the great New York Central combination intends to bring its rails into Charlevoix and put in operation the biggest line of car ferries on the great lakes.

A casual glance at the railway map of Michigan indicates the possibilities in such an extension for the Central. The construction of a line from East Jordan to Charlevoix would complete a virtually straight line from Detroit and Bay City. The Bay City Division which stretched from Detroit and Bay City to Cheboygan touched the Detroit and Charlevoix at Frederic. The Detroit and Charlevoix was an independent road built to Frederic for the express purpose of opening up a direct rail route to the city of the straits from the northwestern district of lower Michigan. As the name implies it was designed to touch Charlevoix, but it never had been built farther into the northwest than East Jordan. This is the present terminal. Now it happens that the Michigan Central not so long ago secured control of the Detroit and Charlevoix. So today it has a direct line from Detroit to East Jordan. It is only about four miles from East Jordan to Charlevoix.

Transportation authorities indicate that the opening up of such a line and the installation of a car ferry service would open a vast new territory for the Michigan Central and more than triple its capacity for east and west freight traffic.

The line would have to be rebuilt in spots to care for the heavier motive power and rolling stock required for heavy through freight traffic, but it would be a comparatively small outlay in comparison with the importance of the move.

Passenger service on this line necessarily would be improved, but it never would be so heavy as on the main line leading to Chicago and there would be much less interference with the freight movement. In fact the new line could be made in most exclusively freight road and would be able materially to reduce the normal freight congestion in the Central's main lines in Michigan.

The question of harbor facilities is what interests Charlevoix more especially. The regular channel is a strait narrow for facility in getting big lake craft in and out. But Charlevoix is not restricted to its harbor facilities in Round Lake. In fact there is every reason to believe that in case the Michigan Central does establish a lake ferry system the terminal of the car ferry steamers will be in the lee of Rocky Point and the Charlevoix peninsula where the dock of the new Standard Cement & Lime Company is being built.

Officials of the new company have been prevailed upon to put in a dock a good deal wider than necessary for its own purposes upon the very theory that the Michigan Central soon would be seeking a ferry terminal. The company has the right of way leading to the dock and doubtless would be glad to give the Central the privilege of laying its rails to the dock and making its ground a terminal for a rather nominal rental. The terminal would in itself be sufficient inducement to warrant the company in extending every privilege to the railway.

SPRAYING INSTRUCTIONS

Professor L. R. Taft Gives Important Instructions

For Profitable Production Orchards Must be Sprayed Regularly.

If good fruit is to be grown, orchards must be sprayed to protect them from the attack of insects and diseases. The spraying is preventive and must be given before the injury has been done, and must not only be so thorough as to cover every part of the trees, but be applied sufficiently often to protect the leaves and fruit at all times.

Number and dates of sprayings: Ordinarily, unless it is necessary to spray for the San Jose scale, the first treatment should be after the flower buds show white or pink, but before the petals have actually opened. A second spraying should be given within eight days after the petals have fallen and the third about fifteen to twenty days later. For winter varieties of apples, a fourth application at the time of the emergency of the second brood of codling moth larvae, which is generally about the middle of August, should be made.

This will ordinarily do, but additional treatments will often be desirable in wet seasons to control apple scab; also if the weather is cold so that the first brood of codling moth larvae is late in appearing, and on plum and cherry trees likely to be injured by curculio or leaf-blight. For leaf-curl of the peach, spray thoroughly about twenty days before the blossoms will open.

Materials to use: While Bordeaux mixture has in the past been the favorite most used, it is likely to burn the foliage and russet the skin of such varieties of apples as Wagener, Jonathan, Ben Davis and others, and it is but little if any more effective than dilute lime-sulphur solutions, the commercial solutions of which are no more expensive and much easier to use; while a home-made solution can be prepared with but little trouble at one-half the cost of Bordeaux mixture. For these reasons it is probable that lime-sulphur solution will very generally be used in place of Bordeaux mixture, except for the grape.

The best of the commercial mixtures are guaranteed to contain 25 per cent of sulphur in solution and for the first two applications can be used on apple and pears at the rate of 2½ gallons in fifty gallons. For the later sprayings, one to one and one-fourth gallons in fifty gallons will be safer. Upon cherries and European plums not more than one and one-fourth gallons in fifty gallons should be used at any time, and on peaches and Japanese plums some injury is likely to be done even at the rate of two quarts in fifty gallons.

The lime-sulphur solution, used as above, is effective as a fungicide upon the different orchard fruits and strawberries. While a stronger solution (one to ten, or even one to eight if badly infected) should be used for the San Jose scale, either in the fall or in the spring just before the buds open, the diluted solutions will destroy many of the larvae if used while they are crawling about in July and August.

For biting insects, such as caterpillars, tent caterpillars, codling moths, curculio and slugs, an arsenical should be added to the time-sulphur solution. For this purpose arsenate of lead is best, as it is adhesive and will not harm the foliage. Use two pounds to fifty gallons of lime-sulphur solution, or a little more if insects are very numerous on about full-grown. Unsprayed orchards produce but little fruit and that of practically no value; if properly sprayed, its value will be vastly increased, and, if this is combined with proper care along other lines it will often bring $300 to $500 per acre.

THE UNION MEETINGS

Are Constantly Increasing in Interest and Attendance.

The special union meetings are being held at the Methodist church this week. The meetings are being conducted by the pastors of the Charlevoix churches.

They are increasing both in interest and attendance. Nine cottage prayer meetings will be held in the various sections of the city during the week. There is nothing sensational in the meetings but a deep earnestness for right living and for a closer walk with God.

The whole city is invited irrespective of religious belief. Come with us and we will do the good.

FOR CIRCUIT JUDGE

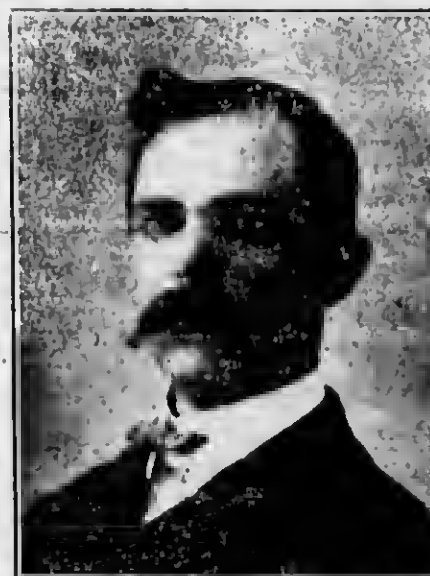

Nomination Will be Made at the March Primary

Elmer N. Clink of East Jordan May Enter into the Race.

At the primary to be held March first, candidates for circuit judge will be named by the primary system, for the first time in the history of the state.

While no one has as yet made formal announcement of their candidacy, in this circuit, it has been rumored that E. N. Clink was being considered for the republican nomination and was being urged to get into the race by his friends.

Mr. Clink, when asked, frankly admitted he was seriously considering the matter and would have something to say in a few days. Should

Mr. Clink get into the race his opponents will realize that they must go some. His legal ability is recognized all over the circuit and his friends are legion. Mr. Clink has always been a progressive in his political ideas. He is not a recent convert to the idea that the people should rule, and would not only be willing, but anxious, to leave the question of his nomination to the people themselves. If defeated he would take his defeat as the verdict of the people in a graceful manner.

He has served the people of this county as prosecuting attorney and left behind him the record of a good public official. We have no hesitancy in saying, that, if nominated, he would be elected by a large majority and would make as good a judge as any in the state.

Fred H. Aldrich, Detroit—President.

Albert L. Buell, Detroit—Secretary and Treasurer.

H. E. Hunt, Coldwater—Vice-president.

G. W. Croner, Charlevoix—Managing Director.

A. Butlers Charlevoix, Harry Nichols Charlevoix, D. B. Hunt Coldwater—Directors.

Ellis Soper, Detroit—Consulting Engineer.

Instructions were also given to rush the completion of the large stone crushing plant and have it ready for the spring business as the company is receiving calls for these products daily.

A large force of men and teams are employed at present cutting and hauling wood for the lime kilns and everything looks as if the company was on the high road to success. All its officers are in the highest spirits. The election of three of our most solid business men on the board of directors will be gratifying news to our readers and indicates that the success of the company is assured from the very start.

WILL BE A SUCCESS

Poultry Show to be Held February 9, 10 and 11.

Secretary Dutton Busy Every Minute Completing Arrangements.

Everything indicates that the first annual poultry show of the Charlevoix Poultry Association, to be held February 9-10-11, will be one of the most successful exhibitions of high-grade poultry ever shown in this part of the state. The lower room of the VanPelt cement block, next to Powers' plumbing shop, has been secured for the show room. The premium list will appear next week.

The local fanciers, of which we have a number, are taking hold of the matter with a vim and are being backed up vigorously by our business men, who realize that the poultry industry is becoming one of the greatest in our country. Charlevoix county is peculiarly adapted to profitable poultry raising.

Secretary Dutton is receiving many inquiries from outside breeders. If you want to see a splendid showing of birds don't fail to attend the poultry show, right next to the Courteen building.

THIS IS CERTAIN

The Proof That Charlevoix Readers Cannot Deny.

What could furnish stronger evidence of the efficiency of any remedy than the test of time. Thousands of people testify that Doan's Kidney Pills cure permanently.

Grateful endorsements should prove undoubtedly the merits of this remedy. Years ago people right in this locality testified to the relief they had derived from the use of Doan's Kidney Pills. They now confirm their testimonials. They say that time has completed the test.

W. E. Van Camp 115 E. St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "I was subject to severe pains in my back and if I caught cold, I suffered more intensely. When Doan's Kidney Pills were brought to my attention, I obtained a supply and it did not take them long to cure me. I am pleased to give this remedy the praise it deserves." (Statement given August 21, 1908.)

GOOD REASON FOR RE-ENDORSEMENT On August 3, 1908 Mr. VanCamp said: "The public statement I gave in praise of Doan's Kidney Pills some years ago still holds. My cure has been permanent."

Examine Your Daily Paper.

Does the daily paper which you welcome to your home and pay for advertise intoxicating drinks and brewers' falsehoods?

Does it, friends? Please look and see.

The chances are that you will find lager beer recommended, and perhaps display advertising and reading notices designed to popularize or defend the liquor traffic.

Perhaps it will contain some distorted quotation from a religious or temperance paper, adroitly fixed up to indicate opposition to temperance laws, or sympathy for the saloon business.

Comparatively few of our great daily newspapers have been true enough to the welfare of their readers, or brave enough in relation to the drink fraternity, to cast out this class of advertising. They prefer cash to conscience.

But here is what a Kentucky paper said on this matter, and it is in substance whatever daily newspaper in Detroit, Bay City, Saginaw, Grand Rapids and other large cities of Michigan should forthwith proceed to say:

"All contracts for whisky, advertisements in the Ledger have expired, and from this date on whisky advertisements will appear in these columns at any price. If saloon people desire to expatiate on the merits of any peculiar brand of their damnation, they can look elsewhere for a medium through which to extol their virtues. The Ledger makes no claim to sanctification, but when a saloonkeeper tells us that six dollars' worth of advertising in the Ledger has sold for him $120 worth of whisky, it makes us feel that we have been in a small measure responsible for the damage done, and we promise to 'sin no more.'"

Literary Notes

Making the Home Pay.

"Marketing home products advantageously is of paramount importance," says Kate V. Saint-Maur in Woman's Home Companion for January, "and seems to be the point on which many beginners fail. Commission men and wholesale markets should not be resorted to because home-grown products of all description excel in quality and not in quantity; therefore, appeal to high class private custom, who desire the very best, regardless of price."

"I have never sold through any ordinary market channels, yet have always had more orders than I could fill and received a little more than the ordinary prices." Naturally the location of the home and of the wares must influence the returns to some extent, but not half so much as the method of packing and shipping. Nicely in these respects captures the favor of customers and they take pride in exhibiting things to their friends—which is the very best sort of advertising a home business can have."

"When I had reached the point where I knew that I could depend on a certain number of eggs regularly, I wrote to a doctor friend in therapy and told him that I could promise to deliver six dozen strictly fresh-laid eggs twice a week for the whole year, at a uniform price of forty-five cents a dozen; customers to pay the express charges, which would be twenty-five cents on each six dozen. (Express companies return empty packages free of charge.) Within a month he had found four customers for me, who would take two dozen a week each, the box to be delivered at his house, where the other three customers were to call every Saturday and Wednesday."

"All poultry-supply houses have wooden boxes for sale with divided trays, made to hold three, six or twelve dozen eggs, for about two dollars apiece. Before the year was out each of the three other customers had interested one or two friends, with the result that three six-dozen boxes were shipped three times a week, and the following winter I had orders from the same people for butter and table poultry."

EDUCATION.

If we work upon marble it will perish, if we work upon brass time will efface it, if we rear temples they will crumble into dust, but if we work upon immortal minds, with the just fear of God and love of our fellow men, we engrave on those tablets something which will brighten to all eternity. —Daniel Webster.

Neighborhood Notes

It is somewhat uncertain whether this country has a drain commissioner, or will have one. The statute requires this official to give a bond for $10,000. In this county that amount would not pass through his hands in ten years. A surety company's bond for the term costs about $100 and the salary perhaps $200 at the best, thus being one of the counties where there are practically no drains to be constructed and the office is a sinecure. For these reasons Mr. Maxwell, who was elected at the late election, has not qualified and possibly he may not. —Elk Rapids Progress.

A movement has been started directed towards the development of a fancy potato industry in Western Michigan. A few weeks since, a careful investigation of the potato situation in Chicago was made by a member of the Western Michigan Development Bureau, and said investigator has reported that there is an increasing demand among the classy hotels and restaurants for extra fine stock for baking purposes and that these places are paying from ten to twenty cents more a bushel for the purpose of getting fancy tubers. At the present time Colorado stock is being used to supply this trade but it is now proposed to enlist the farmers of Western Michigan in an enterprise to grow potatoes to satisfy these demands. New seed is to be introduced and the planting date is to be advanced so as to get the stock fairly ripe before the early fall frosts. Those who are backing the industry are sure that Western Michigan can meet the western states in this matter of supplying top grade potatoes for the fancy trade.

The members at Lantrum lodge, Knights of Pythias, are planning to hold a big special session at the old Rathbone schoolhouse at Elk Harbor early the coming summer, when the first degree, dramatic and amplified form, will be put on. It will be made a great pilgrimage of the Pythians of the copper country. Special trains over the Keweenaw Central railway will be arranged for, and there will be carriages and automobiles to handle the crowds between the trains and the Harbor. It is expected that a hundred or more Pythians of the Calumet and Lantrum lodges, as well as many from Columbia lodge of Houghton and the Hancock and Chassell lodges will attend. It will be the first big session ever held by the Knights of Pythias in the old schoolhouse where Rathbone wrote a portion of the ritual of the order which has been preserved by copper country Pythians in the memory of the order's founder. It was at first planned to hold a big session of Pythians at the old school house during the past fall or the present winter, but it was soon found that this was not at all feasible. The building is a very small one and has but one room. It would be impossible, therefore, to provide the needed ante rooms, dressing room, etc., and leave room for putting on the work. In the spring tents will be erected. A special dispensation will be segregated from the grand lodge of Michigan for holding the session at the schoolhouse and it is not at all improbable that members and officers of the grand lodge will attend.

deficit when the various township treasurers of the county will have settled with the county treasurer and placed the taxes collected by them in his hands. The board of supervisors, at their meeting in October ordered raised about ten thousand dollars more than they figured it would take to run the county during the fiscal year, and planned to use this amount to pay off the debts of the various county funds. For nearly twelve years the county debt has been increasing year by year but the amount raised this year will place us on level footing again, and from now on the supervisors will in all probability, raise enough to run the county and have a slight balance on hand in the county depository at all times. —Petoskey Record.

CHAPTER XXII

FOR nearly an hour Boyd Emerson sat alone on the deck of the Grande Dame, a prey to conflicting emotions, the while he waited for Mildred to appear. There was as one to dispute his presence now, for the tourists who had followed Dr. Berg from the shore in hushed excitement avoided him, and the sailors made no effort to carry out their earlier instructions; hence he was allowed opportunity to adjust himself to the sudden change. It was not so much the unexpected downfall of WILLIS Marsh and the new light thus thrown upon his own enterprise that upset him as a puzzling alteration in his own purposes and inclinations. He had come out to the yacht to make good his threat and to force an understanding with Mildred Wayland, but now that he was here and his way made easy he began to question his own desires. Now that he thought about it that night instead of during the day, he was not so sure of his faithfulness. After three years of unflagging devotion was he really relieved to have her dismiss him? Or was it that here in this private corner, stripped of all conventions, he saw her and himself in a new light? He did not know.

The late twilight was fading when Mildred came from her stateroom. She found Boyd pacing the deck, a clear gleam in his teeth.

"Where are those people?" she inquired.

"They went ashore. Marsh doesn't care to press a charge against the Indian."

"I hear he is not badly hurt, after all."

"That is true. But it was a close shave."

Mildred shuddered. "It was horrible."

"I never dreamed that Constantine would do such a thing, but he is more Russian than Meant, and both he and his sister are completely under the spell of the priest. They are intensely religious, and their idea of damnation is very vivid."

"Have you seen father?"

"We had a short talk."

"Did you make up?"

"No. But I think he is beginning to understand things better—at least as far as Marsh is concerned. The rest is only a matter of time."

"What a frightful situation! Why did you ever let father announce my engagement to that man?"

Emerson gazed at her in astonishment. "Pardon me! How could I help it?"

"You might have avoided quarreling with him. I think you are very inconsiderate of me."

Boyd regarded the coat of his sister with a slight gleam of amusement in his eyes as she ran on:

"Even that woman took occasion to humiliate me in the worst possible way."

"It strikes me that she did you a very great service. I have no doubt it was quite as distasteful to her as to you."

"Absurd! It was her chance for revenge, and she rejoiced in making me ridiculous."

"Then it is the first ignoble thing I ever knew her to do," said Boyd slowly. "She has helped me in a hundred ways. Without her assistance I could never have won through. That evening she would still be grown up to moss and bones, and I would still be a disheveled dreamer."

"It's very nice of you, of course, to appreciate what she has done. But she can't help you any more. You surely don't intend to keep up your acquaintance with her now." He made no reply, and, taking his silence for agreement, she went on: "The thing home will be terribly dull for me, I'm afraid. I think—yes, I shall have father ask you to go back with us."

"But I am right in the midst of the run. I can't leave the business."

"Oh, business! Do you care more for business than for me? I don't think you realize how terribly hard for me all this has been. I'm still frightened. I shall die of nervousness without some one to talk to."

"It's quite impossible! I don't want to go back now."

"Indeed! And no doubt it was impossible for you to come out here last night for the same reason."

"It was. The fish struck in and I could not leave."

"It was that woman who kept you," cried Mildred. "It is because of her that you refuse to leave this country!"

"Please don't," he said quietly. "I have never thought of her in that way."

"Then come away from this wretched place. I detest the whole country—the fisheries, the people, everything. This isn't your proper sphere. Why not come away now, at once, and begin something new, something worth while?"

"Do you realize the hopes, the heart aches, the vital effort I have put into this enterprise?" he questioned.

But she only said: "I don't like it. It isn't a nice business. Let father take the plant over. If you need money, I have plenty."

"Wait!" he interrupted sharply. "Sit down. I want to talk to you." He drew the wrap closer about her shoulders and led her to a deck chair. The change in him was becoming more apparent. He knew now that he had never felt the same since his first meeting with Mildred upon the arrival of the Grande Dame. Even then she had repelled him by her lack of sympathy. She had shown no understanding of his efforts, and now she revealed as complete a failure to grasp his code of honor. It never occurred to her that any loyalty of man to man could offset her simple will. She did not see that his description of George would be nothing short of treachery.

It seemed to him all at once that they had little in common. She was wrapped completely in the web of her own desires. She would make her prejudices a law for him. Above all, she could not respond to the exaltation of his success. She had no conception of the pride of accomplishment that is the wine of every true man's life. He had waged a bitter fight that had sapped his very soul; he had made and won the struggle that a man makes once in a lifetime, and now, just when he had proved himself strong and fair in the sight of his fellows, she asked him to forego it all. Engrossed in her own egotism, she required of him a greater sacrifice than any he had made. Now that he had shown his strength she wanted to lead him down with golden fetters—to make him a dependent. Was it because she feared another girl? She had tried to help him, he knew—in her way—and the thought of it touched him. That was like the Mildred he had always known—to act fearfully, heedless of what her father might do or say. Somehow he had never felt more convinced of the sincerity of her love, but he found himself thinking of it as of something of the past. After all, what she had done had been little, considering her power. She had given carelessly out of her abundance, while "Cherry"—he saw it all now, and a sudden sense of loyalty and devotion to the girl who had really shared his struggles swept over him in a warm tide. It was most unlike his distant worship of Mildred. She had been his dream, but the other was bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh.

For a long time the two sat talking while these thoughts took gradual form in the young man's mind, and, although the deck was deserted, Miss Wayland had no need to curb her once headstrong voice.

He could not put into words the change that was working in him, but she saw it, and, grasping its meaning at last, she began to battle like a mother for her child. His awakening had been slow, and hers was even slower, but now she found her power over him waning her sense of loss grew and grew as he failed to answer to her half spoken appeal.

Womanlike, she capitulated at last. What matter if he stayed here where his hopes were centered? This life in the north had claimed him, and she would wait until he came for her. But still he did not respond, and it was not long until she had persuaded herself that his battle with the wilderness had put red blood into his veins and his conduct had been no worse than that of other men. Finally she tried to voice these thoughts, but she only led him to a stiff denial of the charges she wished to forgive. As she saw him slipping away from her she began to slip away from her own self, and the flame which had burned so steadily, and when these failed she surrendered every prejudice. It was his love she wanted. All else was secondary. At last she knew herself. She could have cried at the sudden realization that he had not kissed her since their parting in Chicago, and when she saw he had no will to do so the memory of his last embrace arose to torture her. She was almost glad when a launch bringing her father came from the shore and the old man joined them.

The two men were themselves with unobtrusive formality, unable as yet to forget their mutual wrongs. The interruption gave Boyd the opportunity he had not been brave enough to make, and he bade them both goodby. For the time was at his end, and the hour of their departure was at hand.

There were a meaningless exchange of words and a handshake in the glare from the cabin light that showed Mildred's pallid lips and frightened eyes. Then Emerson went over the side, and the darkness swallowed him up.

The girl clutched at her father's arm, standing as if frozen while the creak of rowlocks grew fainter and fainter and died away. Then she turned.

"You see, he came," she said.

The old man saw the agony that blanched her cheeks and answered gently:

"Yes, daughter. He struggled with himself. And if you wish it he may come again."

"But he won't come again. That is what makes it so hard. He will never come back."

She turned away, but not quickly enough to keep him from seeing that her eyes were wet. Wayne Wayland beheld what he would have given half his mighty fortune to prevent. He cried out angrily, but she anticipated his thought.

"No, do, you must never injure him again, for he was right and we were wrong. You see I couldn't understand."

He left her staring into the night and walked heavily below.

Emerson felt a great sense of relief and deliverance as he leaned against his oars. His heart sang in the murmur of the waters beside. For the first time in many months he felt young and free. How blind he had been and how narrow had been his escape from a life that could lead to but one result! The girl was sweet and good, and wonderful in many ways, but three years had altered him more than he had realized. He had begun to understand himself that very afternoon when Cherry had told him her own unhappy secret. The shock of her disclosure had roused him from his dream, and once he began to see himself as he really was the rest had come quickly. He had been doubtful even when he went out to the yacht, but what happened there had destroyed the last trace of uncertainty. He knew that, for him there was but one woman in all the world. It was no easy battle he had fought with himself. He had been reared to respect the conventions, and he knew that Cherry's life had not been all he could wish. But he found the issue squarely and tried to throttle his inherited prejudice. Although he had felt the truth of Fraser's arguments and of Cherry's own words, he had still refused to yield until his love for the girl swept over him in all his power; then he made his choice.

The one thing he found most difficult to accept was her conduct with Willard. Those other charges against the girl were vague and shadowy, but this was concrete, and he was familiar with every miserable detail of it. It took all his courage to face it, but he swore savagely that if the conditions had been reversed Cherry would not have faltered for an instant. Moreover, what she had done had been done for love of him. It was worse than vile to hesitate. Her past was her own, and all he could rightfully claim was her future. He shut his teeth and laid his course resolutely for her landing, striving to leave behind this one bitter memory, converting his mind upon the girl herself and shutting out her past. It was the bitterest fight he had ever waged, but when he reached the shore and stood on the deck he was exalted by the knowledge that he had triumphed; that this painful episode was locked away with all the others.

Now that he had conquered he was filled with a consuming eagerness. As he stole up through the shadows he heard her playing, and when he drew nearer he recognized the notes of that song that had banished his own black desolation on the night of their first meeting. He paused outside the open window and saw by the shaded lamp-light that she was playing from memory, her fingers wandering over the keyboard without conscious effort. Then she took up the words with all the throbbing tenderness that lives in a deep contralto voice.

Last night I was dreaming of thee, love——was dreaming:
I dreamed thou didst promise—
Cherry paused as if entranced, for she thought she heard another voice join with hers. Then she bowed her head and sobbed in utter wretchedness, knowing it for nothing more than her own fancy. Too many times, as in other twilights past, she had heard that mellow voice blend with hers, only to find that the voice had played her false and she was alone with a memory that would never die.

Of all the days of her life this was the saddest, this hour the loneliest, and the tears she had withheld so bravely as long as there was work to do came now in unbidden profusion.

To face those people on the yacht had been an act of pure devotion in Boyd, for her every instinct had rebelled against it. Yet she had known that some desperate stroke in his defense must be delivered instantly; otherwise the ruin of his hopes would follow. She had hit upon the device of using Constantine and Chakavua largely by chance, for not until the previous day had she learned the truth.

The first and only kiss he had ever given her burned fresh upon her lips. She recalled that evening when he had spent alone in this very room, when he had seemed to weaver and her hopes had risen at the dawning of a new light in his eyes. At the memory she cried aloud as if her heart would break:

"Boyd! Boyd!"

He entered noiselessly and took her in his arms.

"Yes, dear," he murmured. But she rose with a startled exclamation and wrenched herself from his embrace. The piano gave forth a discordant crash. Shaking back as from an oppression, she stared into his flushed and smiling face, then breathed:

"You! Why are you here?"

"Because I love you."

She raised her lids to find him still standing there, then fell him with outstretched fingers.

"Our dreams have come true," he said gently and strove to imprison her hand.

"No, no!" Her voice broke wildly. "You don't mean it. You—you haven't come in vain."

"I have come to stay if you will let me, dear."

The committee appointed by President Taft to inquire into the practicability of digging the first section of the lakes to the gulf deep waterways from Lockport to the Mississippi river, has prepared the draft of a report to be made to the president. Although Gen. William H. Bixby, chairman of the commission, said the finding would not be made public in advance, it is said the report will be that a governmental appropriation for the lakes to the gulf waterway is impracticable at this time.

THE NEEDS OF THE HOUR
Subject of Judge Alden's Lecture at the Opera House January 27.
The attention of the public has been called to the importance of the great lecture that is to be given in the Citizen's Lecture Course the twenty-seventh, by Judge Alden. Judge Alden is making a wonderful impression through his remarkable lectures. The Redpath Bureau for some time has been the man of the hour, and engaged his talent for five years, the only contract for that term of years which the Bureau has made. People who like to be entertained as well as instructed ought not to miss this great opportunity. His lecture is the talk of the town wherever he goes. His subject is a timely one, "The Needs of the Hour." The reserve seat sale will open at the Central Drug Store Tuesday evening next, January 24 at seven o'clock sharp. Single admission, fifty cents including reserve. Judge Alden's lecture will be followed by Governor Hoch, of Kansas February 9, and by the Music Makers April 7. The course ticket for three entertainments is offered for seventy-five cents. This gives to the people of Charlevoix a rare opportunity of hearing the best talent of the country at a very small expense.

STILL PLAN FEATS

Aviators Undaunted, Though Rendered More Cautious by Deaths of Moisant and Hoxsey.

By JAMES A. EDGERTON.

HAVING down from the deck of a battleship to land, Eugene B. Ely, the aviator, became undaunted to reverse the process and fly from land to the deck of a battleship. So he arranged with the officials of the San Francisco naval station to meet to skydive out from the California shore to the armored craters of Pennsylvania.

In some respects this is the most sensational feat yet undertaken. It is a brand new, twentieth century way of boarding a man-of-war. The being the month of the San Francisco meet, the thing is being done before it is all so startling. Ely, with all his previous flying experience, has not only reversed his process of flight, but his position on the continent, the previous feat having been pulled off at Hampton Roads on the Atlantic coast. He has likewise reversed all previous human experience. The possibilities he has opened are staggering.

What is to prevent a flock of aeroplanes from boarding a battleship while the aeroplanists with the crew before the jack tarts recover from their astonishment? What is to prevent the sky passengers from dropping bombs on the admiral's head or blowing off the fighting tops and coming towers? It is plain to see that in future our fighting ships will have to be armored not only on the sides and ends, but on top.

Mr. Ely presents us a more pleasing prospect, however. Hereafter when an irate passenger loses his steamer, instead of jumping into the water or shaking his fist and hurling language at the disappearing liner, he can take an aeroplane and land on deck with the casual remark that he always takes ship that way.

Already Sensational Performer.

In Mr. Ely's previous flight he gave a bunch of Uncle Sam's naval officers and men the sensation of their lives. An inclined platform had been improvised on the deck of the Birmingham, and from this the venturesome aviator made his start. It was a windy and rainy morning, and for this reason few believed that the trip would be made. Almost before the onlookers knew it the biplane had left the ship, dipped until it actually grazed the water, then arose to a height of 200 feet and bore away to the faintly outlined Virginia shore, two and one-half miles distant.

Mr. Ely said that when he struck the water his propeller was slightly injured and he himself was blinded by the salt spray covering his goggles. When he had taken time to wipe off the moisture he was far aloft and flying like a bird.

The machine used was the same one in which Glenn H. Curtiss made the journey from Albany to New York. Ely always uses a Curtiss biplane and with it recently won a speed contest against a Wright machine. It would have been a star idea if Ely had decided to take with him on his shore to battleship flight some of the San Francisco belles who eagerly accepted invitations to go aloft during the San Francisco meet. It would have opened a new era in the social annals of the navy. The custom, once having started, might have continued and expanded until Uncle Sam's crews could have looked forward to regular visits from the aeroplane girls' brigades that would literally drop in on them every time their ships got near shore.

Miss Sears Starts Fad.

It was Eleanor Sears of Boston and Newport who started the San Francisco society birds to aviation. Miss Sears was not the first woman to go aloft, but she was about the biggest social noise that had done so, and the sport was soon the fad of the smart set.

Aeroplaning is now in the vogue stage. Men, having found his wings, is trying to find out how to fly. Aviators are agreed that to this fact is due many of the deaths that have cost a shadow upon the sport. Later on, let us hope, we shall settle down to a more serious and cautious gait. While this may not be as sensational or profitable, it will at least be better for the future of aviation and will not break so many necks.

The flight of Ely to the battleship is not exactly of the freak class, since it demonstrated possible uses for the aeroplane in war. But spiral drops, excessive altitude tests and other sensational flying contribute little to the science of aviation and only go to swell the prize money and the death list.

We need not be discouraged, however. Even the bird when he begins to fly has a few hitches. If he, with tens of thousands of years of flying ancestors behind him, falls out of the nest and gets bumped to learning to use his wings what wonder that man, with a few flying ancestors, should suffer a few mishaps!

Perhaps the blackest day in the history of American aviation was that on which two star bird men, Arch Hoxsey and John B. Moisant, met their death.

OF DARING IN AIR

Ely to Fly from Land to Vessel, While Latham Will Try Aeroplane.

Moisant Proved Merit.

Moisant was comparatively new in the game, but his first big feat had centered on him the world's attention. This was a flight with a passenger from Paris to London. It was the first time such a feat had ever been attempted, and aviators agreed that it could not be done. To Moisant such an ordeal was a challenge, and he was fully prepared to try it. On taking with him his two horses, a heavy rain, by first sight, over the city of Paris, the first time such a flight with a passenger had ever been attempted, that on Jan. 7, 1910, then by continuous rain, he flew the coast, over the English channel, and within a few minutes of his flight, when a broken propeller forced him to wait for repairs. Here misfortune after misfortune attended him, but he kept on with dogged perseverance till at last he landed in London.

Moisant's great victory in America was that of winning the prize for the quickest flight from Belmont park around the statue of Liberty and return. That feat was even more daring and thrilling than the Paris-London flight. His two competitors were an Englishman and Frenchman, each with a 100 horsepower motor. When Moisant discovered that no American was entered he hastily bought a fifty horsepower machine from a brother aviator, and although he was a stranger to its mechanism he entered the race without an initial trial flight and won it.

Moisant Proved Nerve.

For sheer nerve there has probably been nothing in aviation quite like it. The machine cost him $10,000, which he had to pay on a mere chance. Then he faced a long flight in an untried machine over a populous city and a large body of water. On the start he encountered a stiff breeze, but took it at an angle. He won by working out a theory and following it. On the way to the statue he mounted rapidly until at one time he was 2,800 feet high. Then he coasted back, with the wind behind him and his motor going full force, at times reaching the marvelous speed of eighty miles an hour. He came in less than a minute ahead of his nearest rival, Claude Grahame White of England.

At the time of his death Moisant was preparing to enter the contest for the Michelin prize at New Orleans. He had placed a heavy gasoline tank in front of his engine, and this may have caused the disaster. At any rate, after a successful flight from the city to the aviation grounds, some miles distant, he was preparing to alight. When about twenty-five feet high his machine suddenly pitched forward and hurled the aviator from his seat as though from a catapult. Moisant struck the soft ground on his head. His neck was instantly broken.

He was a daring spirit. Before becoming an aviator he had been a Central American revolutionist. Personally he was a slight, almost shy man, but adventure was his meat and drink and danger his element. It was the hazard of the sport that drew him to aviation.

Hoxsey Plunged From the Clouds.

Arch Hoxsey's death came at almost the same hour and in a similar manner. It occurred at the Los Angeles meet, where a few days before Hoxsey had cleared above Mount Wilson in a sensational flight and earlier still had broken the world's altitude record. On the fatal trip Hoxsey's machine glided swiftly down from an altitude of 7,000 feet. When within a short distance of the earth and while the crowd was cheering it began to turn over and over and fell a mass of wreckage with the dead aviator pinned beneath the engine.

Hoxsey's mechanic gave it as his opinion that the aeroplanist had died from the swift descent while still 2,000 feet in air. He said he had seen the aviator seemed to lose control of the machine, which then came down as swiftly as if it were falling and apparently without a misstep. Glenn H. Curtiss held a similar view, although he did not believe that death was actually taken place aloft, but rather that Hoxsey had been stricken by aviation sickness, due to swift change of altitude, and had become unconscious. Charles S. Willard, who had been up on the same day, returned to the earth with the statement that no money would tempt him to ascend again, as he had found "the atmosphere as full of holes as a Swiss cheese." His theory was that Hoxsey had fallen into one of these holes in the air and had been unable to right his machine.

Held Altitude Record.

Hoxsey was a high type of aviator, keen and intelligent. His daring is exemplified by the fact that a forty mile gale was blowing at the time he broke the world's altitude record. He then went up 11,474 feet, or over two miles. He is the man who made the great cross country flight from Springfield, Ill., to St. Louis and who took Theodore Roosevelt up for his famous flight.

As a result of these and other fatal accidents, which spread a pall over the aviation sky in 1910, a conservative movement is on foot. Curtiss Field Bishop, first vice president of the Aero Club of America, is out in an appeal for more caution and for useful rather than spectacular efforts. Following the death of Hoxsey, Willard wired to his manager on the Pacific coast to instruct his aviators to attempt no more sensational or record breaking efforts, but to confine themselves to straightaway flights.

Despite the death list the record of 1910 is the most brilliant in the history of aviation. The number of machines and operators increased many fold and all over Europe and America they ing became a recognized sport. In France and other countries aviators are now being regularly licensed, and new laws to govern aviation are being enacted. The same tendency is observed in America. Governor Baldwin of Connecticut devoted a portion of his message to a discussion of aviation laws.

The year of 1911 promises to be even more brilliant than that of 1910. Aside from the shore to battleship flight at San Francisco, Ely promises to attend a meet in Havana in February and to make the trip from the Cuban city to Key West, Fla. One Peruvian and two French aviators have recently visited the isthmus of Panama and in the near future will give two or more flights from ocean to ocean across the canal zone.

Hunts From Aeroplane.

Following his successful attempts to shoot ducks from his monoplane, Hubert Latham says that this year he will go after big game such as antelope. Several Frenchwomen have become experts at the sport, one remaining aloft recently nearly an hour. Feminine aviators promise to become a fixed feature of the sport during the coming twelve months. The year is young, and as the whole world has turned its thoughts to flying who can tell what progress will be made before the advent of 1912?

Among the dead Moisant's effects was found a pathetic letter to his son advising him "against the fascination that attracts you to the life of a bird man." It was the natural cry of a father's heart and revealed the fact that Moisant was not the reckless operator he had been pictured, but one who realized the perils of the air.

Despite the warning it is safe to say that thousands of other young men will harness the air and ride the winds this year and coming years. Man has tried his wings, and the flying fever is in his veins. One hopeful fact is that the Wright brothers, the inventors of the aeroplane and still the kings of the air, are among the living and may be trusted to guide and develop the art until finally it gives us a comparatively safe and general mode of travel.

Learns by Eating His Name.

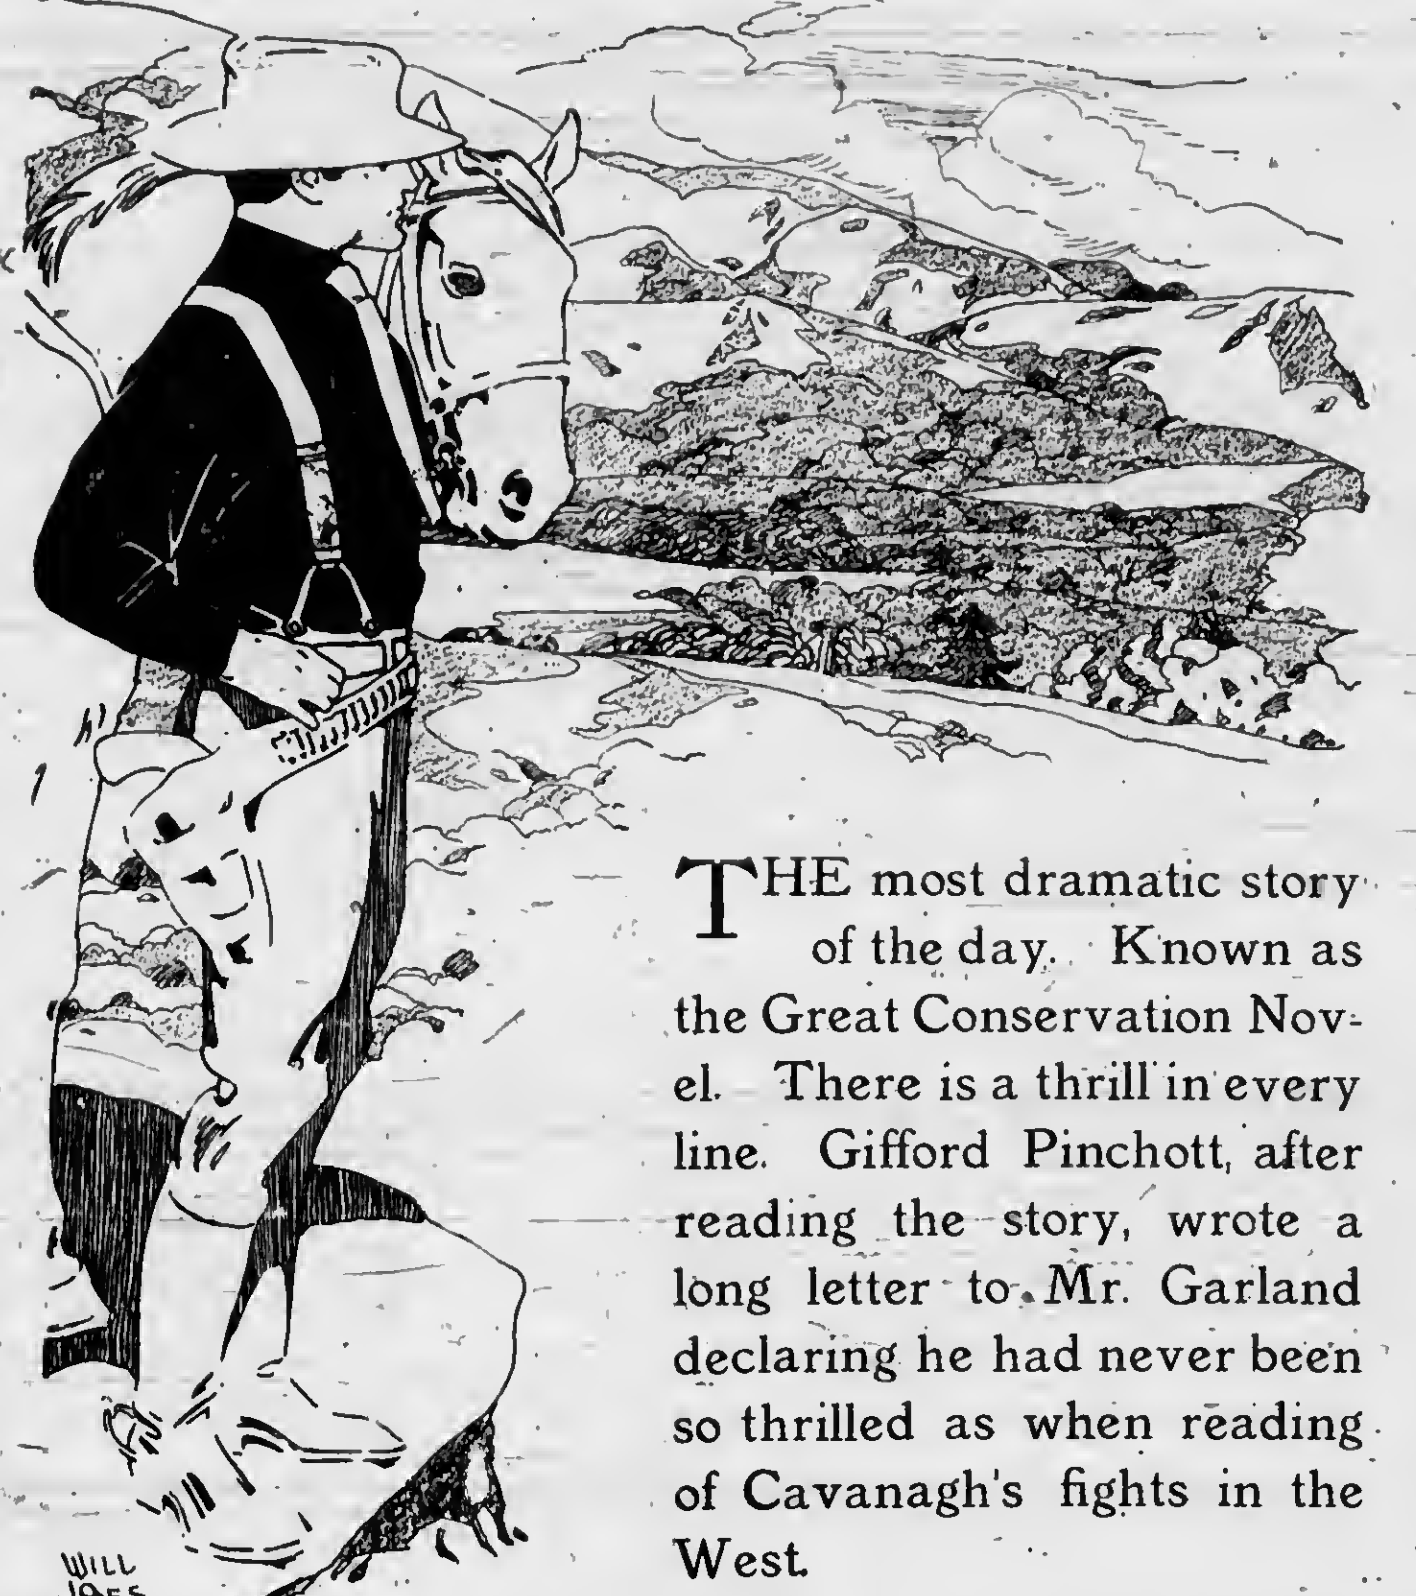

A Serbian teacher, M. Medakovich, has instituted the most successful method of teaching yet discovered. In his school each pupil is provided with a chocolate alphabet, and as soon as he can put his name together correctly he is allowed to eat it. Word making is taught on the same plan. M. Medakovich's pupils on an average can read fluently in three days.

HOW TO HELP.

Drivers Are Given Cards of Instruction.

The North Carolina Good Roads association is distributing throughout the state cards which read as follows: "How to Keep This Road For Years: 'This road was constructed for your use.'"

"Don't drive in one track. Avoid making ruts." "If all use one place all the wear will be in one place and make a rut." "If you use a little care and do not drive exactly where the last wagon did, the wear will be distributed, which will keep the surface smooth and the road will remain good for years; otherwise it will soon be rutted and the smooth surface gone."

It is believed that if those who use the road will give a little attention to where they drive, so as not to drive directly in the same track as the team ahead of them has done, it will prevent the roads from becoming filled with ruts and will have a general tendency to pack the greater portion of the road.

Roads Affect Living Costs.

The National Good Roads union, an article showing the relation of the good roads question to the problem of the increased cost of living and the relatively decreasing population of the farming districts, which are now attracting universal attention. The article shows clearly that improved roads will increase the productivity of our farms, make effective co-operation among the farmers possible, create a market for many of the smaller farm products which are now unsalable, afford better educational facilities for the farmer's children and in many ways make country life more desirable and profitable.

Just What It Needs.

The National Good Roads association met at Niagara Falls, and the most interesting of many resolutions was that which called for the co-operation of state and federal governments in the good work, says the Florida Times-Union. At present the work is a great body without a head. What it needs more than anything else is intelligent direction to a fixed purpose. It will be cheaper to work toward this end than to change the lines after building, as we had to do with our railroads to make them effective as a whole for the good of all.

Drowning.

The popular belief that a drowning person rises to the surface three times is unfounded.

ABOUT BINDING TWINE.

There are very few folks who are not familiar with what is usually known as hemp twine, used for agricultural and many other purposes, but many do not know the source of the enormous supply which is used in this country annually. It is made from two varieties of fiber known as Manila and sisal. The former is one of the chief export products of the Philippine Islands, and nearly all of the amount produced annually, totaling 125,000 tons, is shipped to this country. This fiber is secured from a species of the banana family which attains a height of twenty feet. The stems of the leaves grow in close cluster, forming what has the appearance of a solid trunk to the height of ten or twelve feet, where they branch out like the limbs of an ordinary tree. These bunches of stalks the natives cut off near the ground, remove the leaves from the top of the stalk, then separate the stems and remove the pulp from the fiber by drawing them repeatedly across the edge of a dull blade pressed on a block of wood. This hard work is still in vogue, and a day's work for a native is about eighteen pounds of the cleaned fiber. The growing and cleaning of the Manila are done in the mountainous districts, the natives drying the fiber in the sun, tying it in small bundles and taking it to the coast towns, where it is pressed into bales by machinery for shipment. Sisal, the other fiber from which binding twine is made, comes from the tenequen plant, which is produced chiefly in the province of Yucatan, Mexico, large areas being devoted to growing it. The young plants are set in rows about ten feet apart. At the age of six years the plant is mature enough so that the under and larger leaves are cut and the pulp removed from them mechanically. When the fibers are dried they are baled and ready for market. From this stage on both kinds of fiber are treated the same in the process of manufacture into twine, including carding, working into coarse strands and spinning. The baling machines are automatic, winding five pounds of the finished twine from a bobbin and discharging it when it has reached the proper dimensions. The finished ball is supposed to contain five pounds, and if it is pure Manila fiber it will contain 450 feet and if sisal, which is a coarser fiber, but 500 feet.

APPLES FOR NORTHERN STATES.

The horticultural department of the Iowa State college at Ames has lately issued a little pamphlet in which recommendations are made of varieties of apples suitable for growing in the northern and southern portions of the state, respectively. Inasmuch as Iowa occupies a north central position, the recommendations will be found valuable for a number of other states having about the same climatic conditions. For commercial use in the northern area—the Waltham, Duchess, Patten Greening, Northwestern Greening, Salome, Eastman (for trial) and Colorado Orange (trial) are recommended. For use in the southern part of the state the Jonathan, Grimes Golden, Delicious (trial), Ben Davis family, Stayman, Whitesap, York Imperial and Genton are suggested. For family use a number of other well known varieties are added. In connection with commercial plantings of apples it is well for the beginner to keep well in mind that better results all around, including facility in shipping in large quantities and financial returns, will be had by restricting the varieties to not more than two or three which are recognized as the best. New varieties may be tried out, but the planting should be on a small scale.

LOOK OUT FOR 'EM.

Along about now—well mellow fall days when the roads are blue—is the time when the peripatetic fruit tree vender gets to his work. Not all of his kind are scoundrels, but enough of them are so that the class has come to be viewed largely in this light. Some of these fellows may have good stuff to sell, but before loading up with a lot of it find out where the chap is from and why he is operating so far from home and then tell him you guess you'll wait awhile. In the meantime write to your nearest reliable nurseryman, but if you don't know who he is ask some one who does. Find out what his prices are for small and large quantities of fruit trees, vines or bushes and follow his suggestions as to method and time of planting. Were the above simple directions followed a lot of good hard money would be saved annually, as well as much subsequent disgust and disappointment.

THAT SPRING FREEZE.

The harvesting of the apple crop in the town orchard in which the writer has had an interest for several years was a shabby matter this season. From the same but older trees from which we gathered more than 1000 barrels of the fruit two years ago there were picked this fall a few days ago, a couple of quarts of rusty fruit. We have the consolation of knowing that the harvest expense was not burdened some and that hundreds of orchardists in the area visited by the freeze last spring when the trees were all-bloom fared no better. Scandalous pots would have been of no avail, for in the latitude the cold spell was not a spring frost, but a February blizzard, with all of its frills.

CLAUTIFYING LAMPPOSTS.

Philadelphia's Novel Scheme to Ornament Street Lights.

To improve the appearance of a town nothing should be lost sight of, as sometimes the minor things can be beautified at a small cost. As a striking street ornamentation the lampposts, which in many cases are very plain, can be made most attractive. A novel plan has been adopted in Philadelphia although it is very elaborate, the idea can be adopted by other towns, if necessary, on a plainer scale.

Chief McLaughlin of the electrical bureau in Philadelphia thinks that flower boxes attached to the new lampposts will add greatly to the beauty of the city's center.

Just as Chief McLaughlin had completed a study for ornamenting the lamps about city hall and along Market street with flower baskets there came to him advice from the most progressive of European capitals. Budapest, that the identical thing was being considered there. Since the chief has been working on the plan for some time, however, Philadelphia probably can still claim title to originality.

The accepted design drawn by the chief's daughter, Miss Mabel McLaughlin, illustrates the plan of decoration. Said the chief the other day: "The firm of Strawbridge & Clothier are enthusiastic about the matter, and they have agreed to install and maintain the flower baskets on the lamps in front of their property. I have no doubt that other public spirited citizens will do the same thing."

"It is my intention to place such baskets at least on the ornamental posts at the four entrances to city hall. The plants can be changed three or four times a year, in the winter being filled with evergreens. I believe the appearance of the street will be much enhanced by the simple device of decorating the posts with flower baskets."

It is planned to have these flower baskets the year round filled with flowers and plants of various kinds, according to the season. It is estimated that the cost of maintenance will be $50 a year for each flower basket.

This plan can be applied to electric light stands as well as ordinary lampposts.

She broke from his grasp and moved quickly away.

"Why are you here? I left you out there with—her. I made your way clear. Why have you come back? What more can I do? Dear God, what more can I do?" She was trembling as if desperately frightened.

"There is but one thing more you can do to make me happy. You can be my wife."

"But I don't understand." She shook her head hopelessly. "You are jesting with me. You love Miss Wayland."

"No. Miss Wayland leaves tonight, and I shall never see her again."

"Then you won't marry her?"

"No."

A dull color rose to Cherry Malotte's cheeks. She swallowed as if her throat were very dry and said slowly:

"Then she refused you in spite of everything and you have come to me because of what I told you this afternoon. You are doing this out of pity, or is it because you are angry with her? No, no, Lord! I won't have it. I don't want your pity; I don't want what she cast off."

"It has taken me a long time to find myself, Cherry, for I have been blinded by a vision," he answered. "I have been dreaming, and I never saw clearly till today. I came away of my own free will, and I came straight to you, because it is you I love and shall always love."

The girl suddenly began to beat her hands together.

"You forget what I have been!" she cried in a voice that tore her lover's heartstrings. "You can't want to marry me!"

"Tonight," he said simply and held out his arms to her. "I love you and I want you. That is all I know or care about."

He found her upon his breast, sobbing and shaking as if she had sought shelter there from some great peril.

He buried his face in the soft masses of her hair, whispering fondly to her till her emotion spent itself. She turned her face slowly up at length and pressed her lips to his. Then, holding herself away from him, she said, with a half doubtful yet radiant look:

"It is not too late yet. I will give you one final chance to save yourself."

He shook his head.

"Then I have done my duty," she laughed closer to him. "And you have no regrets?"

"Only one. I am sorry that I can't give you more than my name. I may have to go out into the world and teach all over if Mr. Wayland carries out his threat. I may be the poorest of the poor."

"That will be my opportunity to show how well I love you. You can be no poorer than I in this world's goods."

"You at least have your copper mine."

"I have no mine," said the girl, "not even the smallest interest in one."

"But I don't understand."

She dropped her eyes. "Mr. Hayward is a hard man to deal with. I had to give him all my share in the claims."

"I suppose you mean you sold out to him."

"No! When I found you could not raise the money I gave him my share in the mine. With that as a consideration he made you the loan. You are not angry, are you?"

"Angry?" Emerson's tone conveyed a supreme gladness. "You don't know how happy you have made me."

"Thank!" She laid a finger upon his lips. Through the breathless night there came the faint rattle of a ship's chains.

"The Grande Dame," he cried. "She sails at the flood tide."

"They stood together in the open doorway of the little house and watched the yacht's lights as they disappeared a great curve through the darkness, then slowly faded into nothingness down the bay. Cherry drew herself closer to Boyd.

"What a wonderful Providence guides us, after all," she said. "That girl had everything in the world, and I was poor—so poor—until this hour. God grant she may some day be as rich as I."

Out on the Grande Dame the girl who had everything in the world maintained a lonely vigil at the rail, straining with eagle eyes until the somber shadows that marked the shores of the land she feared had shrunk to a faint, low lying streak on the horizon. Then she turned and went below, numbed by the knowledge that she was very poor and very wretched and had never understood.

THE END.

To Bring It Out.

"I know I've got a vein of poetry in me, sir," confidently asserted the young man to the editor, "and all I want is a chance to bring it out. What would you suggest, sir?"

"I think you had better see a doctor and have it lanced."

The meeting of Harmony grange held Tuesday evening was a decided success. The meeting was open to all and besides the people in the immediate vicinity there were present members of the order from the adjoining granges Wilson, Deer Lake and Pine Lake, making a crowd that filled the school house. Officers for 1911 were installed by Brother O. D. Willson, assisted by Sister Bernice Bacon of Pine Lake grange, in a very impressive manner. Installation was followed by a report from state grange by our delegates Brother O. D. Willson and wife. They gave a thorough and concise report which was appreciated by all.

A short social session was followed by a fine program which had been arranged by the retiring lecturer, which was an illustration of the support that the members had accorded the lecturer during the past year and which will serve as an inspiration to the new lecturer. The enjoyment of the evening was rounded out by as fine a lunch as one could wish for, making it altogether an occasion long to be remembered.

ROAD WORK IN TEXAS.

How Gravel Highways Forty Feet Wide Are Built.

The method of constructing roads in Ellis county, Tex., was described at a recent road convention in that state by County Judge Spencer. He stated that during the preceding year eighty miles of roads had been completed in the county, the rate of construction having been between eight and ten miles per month. The commissioners' court has full charge of the work, the commissioners acting as superintendents, but receiving instructions from the court. Four camps were maintained, each camp consisting of a grading, a gravel, a concrete and a rock and labor crew. Two convict crews were hired at $1.25 per work day per man for loading wagons. Foremen receive $75 a month, assistants $45 a month and concrete foremen $3 per day. Labor is paid $1.50 per day, teams for scrapers $3 per day and the same for those hauling one yard loads of gravel, with $3.50 per day for those hauling loads of one and one-quarter yards each. One man is employed to do nothing but locate and test gravel. The equipment, such as scrapers, water wagons, wheelbarrows, picks, drills, shovels, tool boxes, tents, etc., costs about $5,000.

A roadway of at least forty feet is aimed at. The roads are built almost entirely of pit gravel, which is bought by the acre at an average cost of about 7 cents per load. The first twenty miles of road cost an average per mile as follows:

Grading	$32.54
Gravel, rock and pit work	127.16
Labor and salaries	527.48
Gravel and rock hauling	1,183.36
Dynamite and powder	11.00
Engineering	58
Concrete construction	145.25
Miscellaneous	19.83

The average width of gravel was sixteen feet and the average depth four inches at the edges and twelve to twelve and two-thirds at the crown. The average number of loads of gravel and rock per mile was 1,534 and the average haul two miles. The average cost of haul per mile load was 32 1-3 cents. There was an average of two and one-half concrete bridges and culverts per mile, costing an average of $50.70 each. These were built of reinforced concrete, the reinforcement being bought by the carload and the cement in 4,000 barrel lots. These are built on the general rule of providing one square foot of opening for each four or five acres to be drained.

The services of an engineer may be required on some extremely flat or level places. Our commissioners and foremen, however, have been able to handle this feature of our work satisfactorily in all but one instance. This service apparently cost them $11.23, which gives a very small average per mile, since this was the only engineering item for twenty miles of road.

The Hum of the Hive.

Injury is done beekeepers by spraying fruit trees with poisonous substances before the petals fall.

The use of comb foundation has made possible the production of straight brood and extract combs and marketable comb honey.

It's nice to have your supers all clean, with the foundation fixed in the frames and sections. When the bees need them put them on.

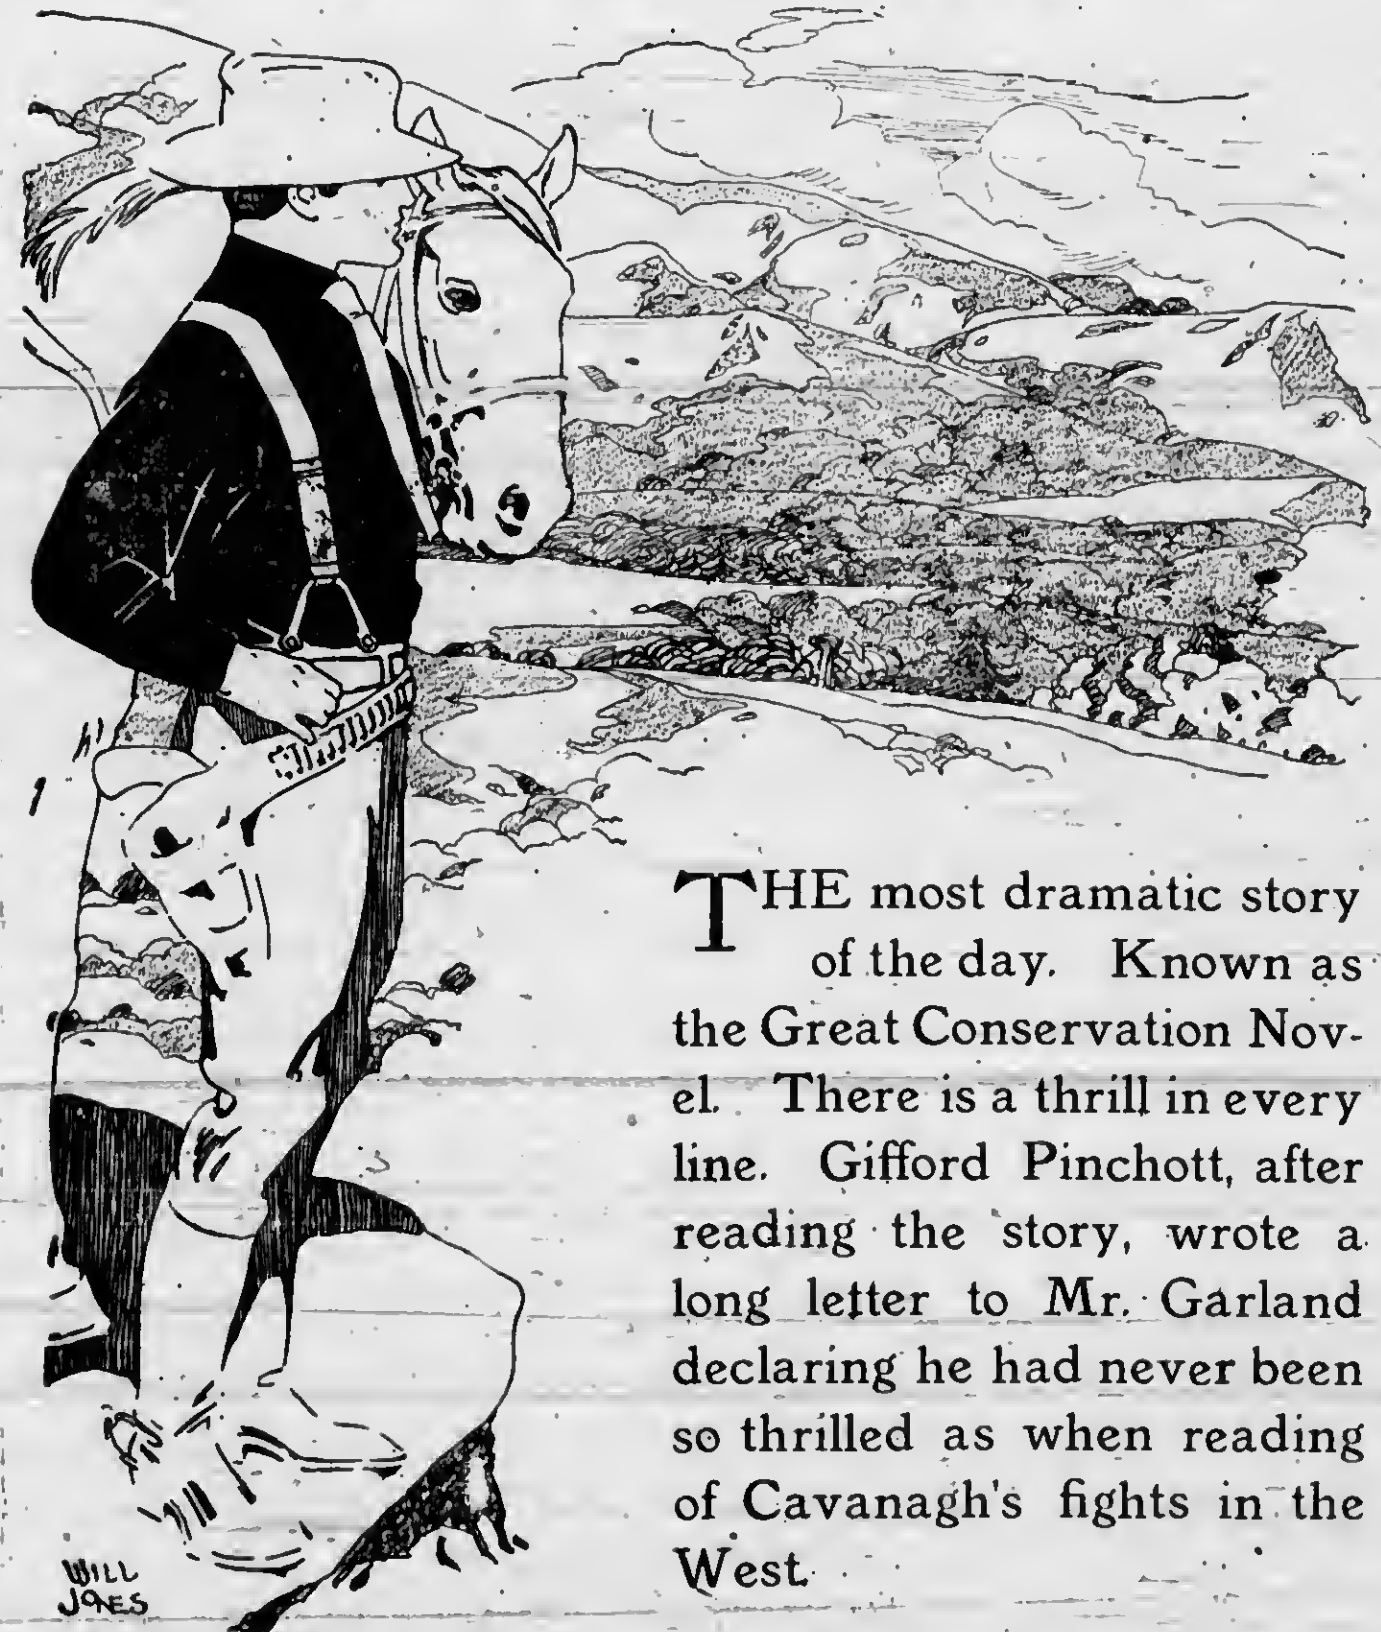

Some beekeepers use a trap at the entrance of the hive. This trap allows the workers to pass, but catches and holds the queen when the bees swarm.

Did you ever think that an ounce of wax is worth nearly 2 cents, that it does not take a very large piece to weigh an ounce and that there are always a demand and ready sale for it?

If you keep your smoker in the honey house cut an old five-gallon can in two and nail half of it to the wall near the door in which to place the smoker when you have emptied out the coals after using it. Should a few stray sparks remain in it there will be no danger of them dropping on to something combustible and starting a fire.

BEANS ARE A PAYING CROP

Charlevoix County Farmers Are Beginning Their Culture.

GROWING THEM IMPROVES THE FARM

Prices Have Been Very High in Recent Years.

By-products Such as Pods and the Way the Ground is Left Pay for Labor—Other Points in Growing Beans.

Charlevoix county farmers are beginning to take up the culture of beans, a large acreage having been grown last year, with profit to the growers, who contemplate planting a larger acreage this year.

Having had several years experience in the culture of beans and knowing that like beets, the cultivation required makes better farms and better farmers as well as increasing the bank account of the man who grows them. I am glad that Charlevoix farmers are taking up this culture, for with our fruit growing, dairy interests and beet culture added to bean growing our farmers are on the high road to success.

Like every other crop the first essential to successful bean growing is perfect seed. Pick your seed beans carefully. Be sure they are all of a uniform size and polished. Guard carefully against any spots upon them. With carefully selected seed—and you cannot be too careful—you will get a uniform stand, all coming up at the same time of thrifty healthy plants.

Having selected good seed the next essential is thorough preparation of the seed bed. In the chief bean growing sections a rotation generally followed is corn, beans, wheat and clover or something along the same lines. If this rotation is followed draw your manure on the clover sod and plant to corn. After the corn is harvested, in the fall if possible, if not as soon as spring opens disc the corn stubble, this serves two purposes, cuts up the corn stubble so it can be plowed under and puts the weed seeds where they can sprout. After discing, in a few days or after the weeds start, plow and after plowing continually harrow, every time a crop of weeds show themselves, until time for planting, which should be after danger of frost has passed, in June. Before drilling roll the ground. Drill from one-half to a bushel per acre—I have received equal results from both—using an eleven inch drill. Be sure and drill your head lands wide enough so you have ample room to turn around when harvesting.

After drilling roll again. In a day or so go over the field with a weeder or spike tooth harrow, and if the weather conditions are favorable, you can begin cultivation in a week's time. Get it as soon as possible. Don't let the weeds ever get a start. Usually three cultivations will be sufficient. Don't overcultivate when the plants are damp, not even with dew, nor when in bloom. You will probably have to do some hand weeding before the crop is laid by.

In harvesting don't pull the whole field at once but get what you can readily get in at once, ready about of the way at a time. Always be sure they are perfectly cured before hauling. The secret of curing beans is to keep them moving all the time. It has been found best to stack them in preference to putting in the barn this keeping the dirt out of the barn. If they are stacked be sure and make a good foundation so there will be no danger of their drawing moisture from the soil and have a thick layer of straw at the bottom, cover with canvas.

The best thing about the bean crop is the thorough cultivation which is required makes an ideal seed bed for the crop of small grain which follows in rotation, no plowing being required and you have the pods left—which are equal in feeding value, especially to sheep, to clover hay, so, taking these two items into consideration, whatever you get for the beans, and they have been fetching a good price for several years, is pure profit. The critical period is at harvest and it is up to you to be very careful at this time. They are also easily frosted and you must grow them and get them out of the way between frosts, but if you succeed, and you generally will, you have grown a money crop and have destroyed an immense lot of weeds, besides having a lot of winter feed.

DR. WILLIS KERNS DEAD

Was Former Register of Deeds of Charlevoix County.

Had Resided in County Since 1879—Filled Many Offices.

Dr. Willis Kerns, who died Saturday morning at his home at Bay Shore, was probably one of the best known men throughout several counties of northern Michigan, either personally or by reputation, having been one of the earliest practicing physicians in all this region, and traveled all over the country on foot when there was nothing but bypaths through the almost trackless wilds, and ministered to the physical ailments of the sparsely populated community.

Willis Kerns was born at Johnson, Tenn., June 30, 1850, but at the age of three years moved with his parents to Kioogold, Ga., where he grew to young manhood through the stirring times of the Civil war. Mr. Kerns received his collegiate education at the Eastern Tennessee university, Knoxville, Tenn., being graduated there from in 1880. From that institution he entered the medical department of the Iowa State university, and received his degree as a medical practitioner in 1883.

In 1879, he was married to Miss Clara Phetteplace, who though a native of Otsego, Allegan county, Michigan, was teaching school at West Point, Nebraska, and together the young couple came to Northern Michigan where the doctor plied his profession, locating at Clarion where he lived many years, and throughout which community he was greatly beloved up to the time of his death, and he leaves a highly respected memory among all who knew him.

During his long residence in Charlevoix county Dr. Kerns filled several important official positions, serving in different capacities. He was three years township clerk, four years county clerk and eight years county register of deeds, serving faithfully and well.

For the past ten years he has suffered more or less from ill health which induced him to retire practically from the practice of medicine, and the past few years of his life was spent at Bay Shore where his family still reside. A few months ago he developed malignant cancer which slowly ate his life away, and for several weeks he suffered intensely.

He leaves his wife and one son, Willis J., of Flint, and two daughters, Mrs. Gertrude Ross and Miss Marcia Kerns, both of Bay Shore.

Mr. Kerns was not a member of any secret or fraternal society, the only allegiance he admitted was to the Methodist church, which he most dearly loved, and of which he was a member for many years, and his political party, which honored him frequently.

The interment took place at Clarion Sunday afternoon, Rev. Burdick of that village in charge.

ANALYSIS GIVEN

Of the Commonly Sold Brands of Lime-sulphur Solution.

By the State Inspector of Nurseries and Orchards.

Many fruit growers are making inquiries regarding the comparative value of the home-made and commercial lime-sulphur sprays, and also as to the reliability of the different commercial brands, and this method is taken of replying to them.

The value of any lime-sulphur spray mixture is in proportion to the per cent of sulphur contained in solution, and a law passed by the last legislature requires the manufacturers of lime sulphur solution, as well as of all other insecticides and fungicides, to submit a guaranteed statement to the analysis of their brands.

The following are the brands which are most commonly used in Michigan, with the percentages of sulphur guaranteed by the manufacturers, together with the amount found in samples collected and analyzed during the year:

Name of manufacturers.
Blanchard (Lion Brand) guaranteed 20.00, found 23.27. Dow guaranteed 25.50, found 26.81. Grasselli guaranteed 24.00, found 26.66. Niagara 25.00, found 26.55. Rex guaranteed 25.00, found 26.00. Sherwin-Williams guaranteed 25.00, found 25.43.

The figures show that all of the brands have a good margin of sulphur in solution above the guarantee, and indicate that all of the manufacturers are putting out a good article and are endeavoring to comply with the requirements of the State Insecticide law.

Some authorities advise against the use of a solution which contains less than 24 per cent of sulphur in solution, but the writer would not discriminate against them, except to value them in proportion to their guaranteed analysis, and considering that a brand containing 24 per cent of sulphur is worth one-third more than a brand which contains only 18 per cent, making a barrel of the former worth $10.00 as compared with $7.50 for the latter.

One should not be deceived by what purports to be the guarantee on the label, as if a label reads, "Sulphur—18 to 27 per cent," the amount guaranteed is only 18 per cent, and the use of the two per centage indicates that the manufacturer is either trying to deceive the public or that he does not have sufficient confidence in his method of manufacture to guarantee a definite percentage.

Some of the local dealers in lime-sulphur solution are charging from ten to twelve dollars per barrel, but in sections not too far removed from a factory and having fair railroad facilities it should not cost more than $9.00 to $9.50 per barrel.

If one does not object to the bother of making it at home the cost would not be more than $1.00 per barrel, including labor, fuel and materials, but it is important that the lime used should not contain more than five per cent of magnesia, while most of the lime on the market has 15 per cent and some as much as 40 per cent. This is objectionable as it wastes the sulphur, and besides unless one can be sure of the quality of the lime the product will not be uniform. For these reasons most growers will find it more satisfactory in the end to purchase some good brand.

UNION WORK CONTINUED

Services Will Be Held this Week at Congregational Church.

The united churches voted unanimously last Friday evening to continue the Union Gospel services. The churches had been working together for three weeks with the exception of the Sunday morning services, which has been held separately. After careful consideration the pastors decided to make all of the services union, and Sunday morning the three congregations came together in the Methodist church. The service was most impressive with the large congregation and the large chorus choir, and an excellent sermon by Rev. Eble. The speaker set forth with great power the importance of personal work in behalf of the unconverted. The audience was deeply moved and it is believed that a lasting impression was made. This service was followed by a union Sunday school in the three churches engaged in the evangelistic campaign, and the Episcopal Sunday school. In the evening the young people held a strong meeting at six o'clock. At seven o'clock Rev. Taylor spoke effectively to a large congregation.

HOME MISSIONARY

Work is Plan of the Development Bureau.

Will Make Exhibits in Michigan and the Eastern States This Year.

Home missionary work is the kind of employment thrust upon Secretary John I. Gibson of the West Michigan Development bureau at the annual meeting of the executive board held at the Hotel Pentland in Grand Rapids last week. It was an all-day session, barring the time taken out for luncheon with the board of trade committee of 100, and the conclusion reached was that it is Michigan that needs educating on the possibilities of Western Michigan, rather than Chicago and the west.

It is probable that the association will not be represented at the Chicago land show this year, but on the contrary, extensive exhibits will be put on at the Grand Rapids and Detroit fairs and at other fairs in the state. The board also went on record as supporting the Davis bill pending in congress, providing for an agricultural high school in every congressional district. The bureau is also to back a movement for the conversion of county farms into experiment stations, that practical farmers may take lessons near home. The secretary was instructed to do all in his power to bring the boards of trade and commercial associations throughout the state into closer relations with the farmer and farm associations.

The bureau spent $21,000 the past year and is going after at least $25,000 for use this year. The railroads traversing western Michigan, and the boat lines are to contribute liberally to this sum, but cities in the district are also to be asked to do their part. It is expected that each of the twenty counties within the bureau's domain will contribute one-tenth of a mill on assessed valuation to carry on the work.

Present at the meeting were President D. H. Day of Glen Haven, Treasurer B. R. Hendel of Manistee, Secretary John I. Gibson of Traverse City, and F. A. Mitchell, general freight agent M. & N. E. A. Patriarche, vice president Pere Marquette, Hugh Gray, general passenger agent of the Pere Marquette, E. C. Levensworth general freight agent G. R. & L. R. P. Cross, manager of the Land Show, Chicago; Louis P. Thight of Marquette, D. S. Payton of Charlevoix and Henry Vinkemulder of Grand Rapids.

The advisability of establishing horticultural bureaus was also considered at the meeting.

ONE DAY INSTITUTE

Held Thursday at the Court House Was a Success in Every Way.

The one day farmers' institute held at the court house Thursday was well attended a good crowd being present at every session and good interest being taken in the discussions. A. P. Gray of Traverse City, the state speaker, was right at home on his subjects and gave good practical talks on alfalfa, spraying and general orchard work at the forenoon and afternoon session, while E. S. Stacks discussed the good road problem in a careful manner, giving the proper method of building a good road and pointing out many specific cases where good roads were needed in this locality. Commissioner Milford gave a rapid fire talk of about five minutes on the growth of agricultural education.

In the evening the county normal illustrated their work and furnished music etc. Mr. Gray gave an inspiring talk. Taken altogether it was one of the most successful one day institutes ever held in this county.

Attorney General Knhn holds that county supervisors cannot provide a salary for sheriff despite the care with which the constitutional convention provided for placing all county officers on a salary basis. As a majority of the counties in the lower peninsula have prescribed salaries for all officers members of the legislature are starting a hurried investigation to determine what action they can take to clear up the situation.

In his opinion the attorney refers to that part of the constitution which provides that board of supervisors shall have power to fix salaries and compensation of all county officers "not other wise provided for by law."

It is this last phrase which the state's legal adviser asserts forestalls action by supervisors. It is thought this ruling also may affect other county officers entitled by laws to fees for official services.

Glen R. Munshaw, supervisor of state trespass, has filed his report public domain commission for the period since the trespass department was organized, July 1, 1909, to December 31, 1910. The report shows there were 195 cases of trespass on state lands, handled by the department. Of this number, 157 have been disposed of and 38 are pending. Thirty prosecutions were started, resulting in fifteen convictions, seven acquittals, one disagreement, five cases settled out of court and two criminal cases now pending. A total of fifty cases were discontinued after an investigation has proven there was no trespass.

How to Can Tomatoes.

Select medium-sized solid tomatoes. Put in a wire basket and plunge in a pan of boiling water. Rub off the skins and arrange in wide mouthed jars. Fill with cold water, adjust the rubbers, lay on the tops and stand in the wash boiler. Cover, bring to the boiling point and boil half an hour. Screw down the tops and leave in the boiler until the next day. Repeat the cooking for another half hour, reckoning from the time the water reaches the boiling point, then screw tight. Tomatoes are easily kept and do not require as long cooking as most vegetables.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND
Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

INTRODUCTION.

My Dear Mr. Garland—You have been kind enough to let me see the proofs of "Cavanagh, Forest Ranger." I have read it with mingled feelings—with keen appreciation of your sympathetic understanding of the problems which confronted the forest service before the western people understood it and with deep regret that I am no longer officially associated with its work, although I am as deeply interested and almost as closely in touch as ever.

Western frontier people faced life with a manly dependence on their own courage and capacity which did them and still does them high honor. Some of them were naturally slow to see the advantages of the new order. But now that they have seen it there is nowhere more intelligent, convinced and effective support of the conservation policies than in the west. The establishment of the new order in some places was not child's play. But there is a strain of fairness among the western people which you can always count on in such a fight as the forest service has made and won.

The service contains the best body of young men I know and many splendid veterans. It is nine-tenths made up of western men. It has met the west on its own ground, and it has won the contest—an episode of which you have so well described—because the west believes in what it stands for.

I have lived much among the western mountain men, differed with some of them and worked with many of them. Sometimes I have lost, and sometimes I have won, but every time the fight was worth while. I have come out of it all with a respect and liking for the west which will last as long as I do. Very sincerely yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

CHAPTER I.

THE DESERT CHARIOT.
LEE VIRGINIA WETHERFORD began her return journey into the mountain west with exultation. From the moment she opened her car window that August morning in Nebraska the plain called to her, sustained her illusions. It was all quite as big, as tawny, as she remembered it, it urena for the epic deeds in which her father had been a leader bold and free.

Her memories of Roaring Fork and its people were childish and romantic. She recalled vividly the stagecoach which used to amble sedately, not to say wheezily, from the railway to the Fork and from the Fork back to the railway in the days ten years before when she had ridden away to it a tearful, despairing, long limbed girl and fully expected to find it wailing for her at Sulphur City, with old Tom Quenian still as its driver.

The first hint of "the new west" came to her by way of the pretentious Hotel Alima, which stood opposite the station at Sulphur and to which she was led by a colored porter of most elaborate and kindly manners.

This house, which furnished an excellent dinner and an absorbing mixture of types both American and European, was vaguely disturbing to her. It was plainly not the old time west—the west her father had dominated in the days "before the invasion." It was indeed distinctly built for the tourist trade and was filled with all that might indicate the comfortable nearness of big game and good fishing.

Upon inquiry as to the stage she was amazed to hear that an automobile now made the journey to the Fork in five hours and that it left immediately after the midday meal.

the free range was disclosed, with few changes save in the cattle, which were all of the harmless or harmless variety, appearing tame and spiritless in comparison with the old time half wild broodmare breeds.

Lee began to wonder if she should find the Fork much changed—her mother was a had correspondent.

Her unspoken question, opportunely asked by another, was answered by an old woman passenger. "Oh, Lord, yes! Summer tourists are crawling all over us since this old line began. Tears like all the lure armed boobies and cross-legged little rips in Omaha and Denver had just got to ride in and look us over. Two of them new hotels in Sulphur don't do a thing but feed these tenderfeet. I s'pose prohibition will be the next grand stand play on the part of our town lot boomers. We old cowpunchers don't care whether the town grows or not, but these hyer bankers and truck farmers are all for raising the price of land and taxing us quiet fellers out of our boots."

The girl was brought back to the vivid phases of her life by the harsh voice of one of the men. "Lee Wetherford is going to get jumped one of these days for sellin' whisky without a license. I've told her so too. Every body knows she's a-doin' it, and what beats me is her goin' along in that way when a little time and money would set her straight with the law."

The shock of all this lay to the fact that Eliza Wetherford was the mother to whom Lee Virginia was returning after ten years of life in the east; and the significance of the man's words froze her blood for an instant.

The young fellow on the back seat slowly said, "I don't complain of Lee sellin' had whisky, but the grub she sets up is fierce."

"The grub ain't so bad; it's the way she stacks it up," remarked another. "But, then, these little dyab cow towns are all alike and all bad, so far as hotels are concerned."

Lee Virginia, crimson and burning hot, was in agony lest they should go further in their criticism.

She knew that her mother kept a boarding house, and while she was not proud of it, there was nothing disgraceful in it. Happily, the conversation turned aside and fell upon the government's forest policy, and Sam Gregg, a squat, wide mouthed, harsh voiced individual, cursed the action of Rosa Cavanagh, the ranger in the district above the Fork. "He thinks he's secretary of war, but I reckon he won't after I interview him. He can't shuttle my sheep around over the hills at his own sweet will."

The young fellow on the back seat quietly interposed. "You want to be sure you've got the sheep on Cavanagh's good and square, Sam, or he'll be a-ridin' you."

"He certainly is an arbitrary cuss," said the old woman. "They say he was one of Teddy's rough riders in the war. He sure can ride and handle a gun. Tears like he thinks he's runnin' the whole range," she continued, after a pause. "Can't nobody so much as shoot a grouse since he came in, and the supervisor upholds him in it."

Lee Virginia wondered about all this supervision, for it was new to her. Gregg, the sheepman, went on: "An

I tell you, I don't object to the forest policy—it's a good thing for me; I get my sheep pastured cheaper than I could do any other way, but it makes me not to have grazing lines run on me and my herders jacked up every time they get over the line. Ross run one bunch off the reservation last Friday. I'm going to find out about that. He'll learn he can't get arbitrary with me."

The old woman chuckled. "Tears like you've changed your tune since '98, Sam."

He admitted his conversion shamelessly. "I for whatever will pay best. Just now, with a high tariff, sheep are the boys. So long as I can get on the reserve at 7 cents a head—lamb's free—I'm going to put every dollar I've got into sheep."

"You're going to get thrown off at together one of these days," said the young man on the back seat.

Thereupon a violent discussion arose over the question of the right of a sheepman to claim first grass for his flocks, and Gregg boasted that he cared nothing for "the dead line." "They've tried to run me out of Deer Creek, but I'm there to stay. I have 10,000 more on the way, and the man that tries to stop me will find trouble."

The car was descending into the valley of the Roaring Fork now, and wire fences and alfalfa fields on either side gave further evidence of the change in the land's dominion. Down past the courthouse, refurbished and deeper sunk in trees, Lee Virginia rode, recalling the wild night when 300 armed and vengeful cowboys surrounded it, holding three cattle larcenists and their hired invaders against all comers, resolved to be their own judge, jury and hangman. It was all as peaceful as a Sunday afternoon at this moment, with no sign of the fierce passions of the past.

The car crossed the Roaring Fork and drew up before two small shacks, one of which bore a faded sign, "The Wetherford House," and the other in fresher letters, "The Wetherford Cafe." On the sidewalk a group of Indians were sitting, and a half dozen slouching white men stood waiting at the door.

As Lee went past the hotel porch her heart beat hard and her breath shortened. In a flash she divined the truth. She understood why her mother had discouraged her coming home. It was not merely on account of the money. It was because she knew that her husband was wrong.

What a squalid little den it was! How cheap, bald and petty the whole town seemed of a sudden! Lee Virginia halted and turned. There was only one thing to be done, and that was to make herself known. She retraced her steps, pulled open the broken screen door and entered the cafe.

It was a low, dingy dining room filled with the odor of ham and bad coffee. At the tables ten or fifteen men, a motley throng, were busily feeding their voracious jaws, and on her left, behind a showcase filled with cigars, stood her mother, looking old, unkempt and worried. The changes in her were so great that the girl stood in shocked alarm. At last she raised her veil. "Mother," she said, "don't you know me?"

A look of surprise went over the older woman's face, a glow which brought back something of her other self, as she cried, "Why, Lee Virginia, where did you come from?" The boarders stopped chewing and stared in absorbed interest, while Virginia blessed her bloomy mother.

"By the Lord, it's little Virginia!" said one old fellow. "It's her daughter."

Upon this a murmur of astonishment arose, and the waiter girls, giggling, marvelling and envious, paused, their platters in hand, to exchange comment on the newcomer's hat and gown. A cowboy at the washing sink in the corner suspended his face polishing and gaped over his shoulder in silent ecstasy. Some of the men came forward to greet her, and though she had some difficulty in recognizing one or two of them (so hardly had the years of her absence used them), she eventually succeeded in placing them all.

At length her mother led her through the archway which connected the two shanties, thence along a narrow hall into a small bedroom, into which the western sunset fell. It was a shabby place, but as a refuge from the crowd in the restaurant it was grateful.

Lee looked at her daughter critically. "I don't know what I'm going to do with a girl like you. Why, you're pretty—pretty as a picture. You were skinny as a child. I'm fair dazed, great snakes how you have opened out. You're the living image of your dad. What started you back? I told you to stay where you was."

"I had no place to go after Aunt Cella died; I had to come home."

"You wrote that was willing to keep you."

"They were, but I couldn't ask it of them. I had no right to burden them, and, besides, Mrs. Hall wrote me that you were sick."

"I am, but I didn't want you to come back. Lay off your things and come out to supper. We'll talk afterward."

The eating house, the rooms and hallways were all of that desolate shabbiness which comes from shiftlessness joined with poverty. Everything on which the girl's eyes fell contrasted strongly with her aunt's home on the Brandywine—not because that house was large or luxurious, but because it was exquisitely in order and sweet with flowers and dainty arrangement of color.

She regretted bitterly that she had ever left her eastern friends. Her mother, in truth, showed little pleasure at her coming and almost nothing of the illness of which a neighbor had written. It was, indeed, this letter which had decided her to return to the west. She had come, led by a sense of duty, not by affection, for she had never loved her mother as a daughter should—yet were in some way antipathetic—and now she found herself an unwelcome guest.

With aching head and shaking knees Virginia re-entered the dining room, which was now nearly empty of its "guests," but was still misty with the steam of food and swarming with flies. These pests buzzed like bees around the soiled places on the tablecloths, and one of her mother's first remarks was a fretful apology regarding her trials with these insects. "Seems like you can't keep 'em out," she said.

With desperate effort Lee conquered her disgust. "Never mind; I'm tired and a little upset. I don't need any dinner." Hastily slipping a cup of coffee, she tried hard to keep back the tears, but failed, and no sooner did her mother turn away than she fled to her room, there to sob unrestrainedly her despair and shame. "Oh, I can't stand it!" she called. "I can't, I can't!"

She felt herself alien and solitary in the land of her birth.

Like came to half an hour later, pathetic in her attempt at "slinking up." She was still handsome in a large feature.

THEATRICAL

On February 3 the athletic association will give their annual play at the Opera House.

Following is the story of the play: Jimmie Cavendish is a typical college fellow, a senior at the U. of M. The night before the opening of the play he has been out on a lark and in his enthusiasm has broken several windows, painted a statue on the campus and to cap the climax, called at the home of Professor Popp, the chairman of the discipline committee and kisses his tyrannical wife, who answered the bell. He escapes but loses his fraternity pin. Mr. Popp finds this and sees Jimmie's name on the back. The play opens next morning at Jimmie's boarding house "Ma" Bagby, the mother of all her college boarders, is expecting her niece from Carolina to spend Thanksgiving with her. The young lady arrives and at once captivates the fancy of Jimmie. Matters are complicated by the arrival of the discipline committee hot on his trail. He manages to get out of the scrape by stating that he was with his aunt the night before. His aunt Jane is thinking about endowing a chair at the college and Jimmie "works" the discipline committee.

They insist on seeing the aunt. However, Jimmie's two chums, Tad and Shurtle, each unknown to the other, agree to impersonate Jimmie's aunt.

Mr. Popp gives a faculty dinner party in honor of Jimmie's aunt and Tad goes disguised as a giddy old maid. Mrs. Popp's brother, the head of the military department proposes to Tad in a ludicrous love scene. The real Aunt Jane arrives from New York and goes to the dinner party. She is met by Tad.

and hustled away before she meets the faculty. Things are beginning to get very exciting for Tad as the Major insists on making love and the dinner party is full of comic interruptions.

The college glee club, after serenading the guests of Mrs. Popp are treated rather shabbily and, out of revenge, they "spike" the punch. The innocent, sheepheaded Popp thinks the punch is better than usual and takes too much. In his exultation he proceeds to lay down the law to his wife but is rebuffed and led by the ear back to the dinner party. Jimmie's admiration for Mrs. Bagby's voice deepens and he obtains her permission to escort her to the Thanksgiving foot ball game.

The third act depicts the excited college crowd on the sidelines of the Thanksgiving foot ball game. It is nearly the end of the first half and the rival team is winning. The Michigan Routers are there—Tad, still disguised as the aunt, amazing Levitizers by smoking a pipe and rooting for Michigan. Mrs. Bagby and the real Aunt Jane arrive at the game. The Major, mistaking Aunt Jane for Tad, renews his love making much to the lady's surprise. Tad arrives and explains the whole joke to the Major. He is indignant and threatens to expel Jimmie, but is finally pacified by Tad's threat to tell all about the Major's love making. The foot ball men need Tad in the game, as he is a substitute player. They mistake Aunt Jane for Tad and rush her out on the field. She is rescued by Jimmie and, because of his heroism forgives all the deception. After a thrilling foot ball description the game is won for Michigan by Jimmie and all ends well.

NEW TALES THAT ARE TOLD

The Bigness of Texas.

Representative Burleson of Texas is proud of telling how big and powerful is the state in which he has the honor to live.

"It's so big," said Burleson on one occasion, "that some of its people don't bother about the rest of the country. One day Colonel Edgar, editor and owner of the Lincoln Star, Nebraska, was traveling in the state, and he came to a little railroad station. At that time all newspaper editors

The People—A Paradox.

As illustrative of the pessimistic attitude of the average politician suffering the pangs of defeat Tom Johnson of Cleveland is fond of telling the following:
The day after the routing of Bryan in 1900 one of the Democratic newspapers in Cleveland sent out a circular telegram inlaying expressions of opinion from various politicians throughout the country. Perhaps the quaintest of the replies was that of an Indiana man, chairman of a county committee. "I read," he said.
"County has gone for McKinley by 200. The people are in the majority. Heaven helps!"

PLANS TO STOP TIDE TO CITIES

Rudolph Spreckels Has Project For Prospective Farmers.

WOULD ENLIST CAPITAL'S AID

Idea is to Have Wealthy Men Buy Up Desirable Land, Then Resell It on Long Payments So One Crop Failure Will Not Entail Loss of Farm—Says Capitalists Should Form a Fund.

Rudolph Spreckels, leader in the San Francisco anti-graft crusade, in addition to ideas for civic reform, has a plan for stemming the tide of the wave of population flowing toward the American cities with such alarming rapidity.

"The trouble with the back to the farm propaganda today," Mr. Spreckels says, "is that, while it distributes a lot of fine advice to the residents of congested sections in our cities, it offers comparatively little aid of a substantial sort. I think that it is not because city dwellers prefer the cities to the country that they remain in a state of industrial dependence, but because they have not the capital required to buy a farm and the stock and implements necessary to make it a paying venture.

Thinks Fund Should Be Formed.

"I believe the capitalists of the United States should form a fund so that they could buy tillable land and then resell it to prospective emigrants from the cities at actual cost, with provision for easy terms of payment. These payments could be so arranged as to extend over a period of fifty or even seventy years. So that there would be little question that the purchaser or his family would eventually own the land.

"As it is, many hesitate to leave their urban homes because farming is a great deal of a risk. They would be compelled to place heavy mortgages on their land, payable in a few years. Under this plan a series of unfortunate seasons would be fatal to the farmer, who would be unable to meet the demands of the incumbrance on his land and would thereby forfeit his holdings, together with the money he had expended in getting started.

Calls It Mistaken Idea.

"The plea to the man of the city to emigrate to the frontier, to hew out a home for himself where land is cheap is mistaken. Pioneer life necessarily entails many hardships, which the city dweller and his wife cannot endure because they are not trained to them. To a man who has been reared on a farm it is difficult enough to transform a stubble prairie or a heavily wooded land into tillable land, but for the inexperienced farmer recruited from the congested cities it is almost impossible. After a few years he will get discouraged and return to his old home and work.

"Here is the difficulty, however. To embark on a farming venture in a district which is already cultivated and settled to some extent requires a big outlay of capital, whereas in pioneer regions land can be obtained either free or for a nominal sum. And this is where the capitalists should extend a helping hand.

Europe's Plan Succeeds.

"In many parts of Europe the plan of long payments for land is in operation and is proving a great success. When the settlers are assured that in case of crop reverses they are not in danger of losing their homes and that if they fail to pay for their homes even in a lifetime their sons can continue the payments they do not hesitate to leave the bench of the wage earner for the plow and the reaper. I understand, too, that this plan has been undertaken in various parts of the United States on a small scale and that efforts along this line have been the source of great satisfaction to those who have supported them.

"It is a great problem, this back to the land movement. It will be the great problem of the future, as it is the problem of the present. Our cities are certain to increase in population immensely for many years to come. The number of mouths to feed grows the number of actual producers on the land must increase or development must cease."

FRENCH HEELS RUIN FEET.

Spinal Curvature Another Phase, According to Minneapolis.

Dr. Charles H. Keene of Minneapolis in a public statement says that the high French heels which high school girls wear are the cause of deformed feet that have to be cured by physical culture, and therefore such heels are to be barred from the school. Dr. Keene will have the physical instructor in the high school find out how many girls have curvature of the spine. He has found many boys in the Minneapolis schools, so afflicted. He attributed the prevalence of curvature of the spine to bad posture, both in sitting and standing, and to faulty customs, and to improper footwear, such as French heeled shoes.

The Burglar Alarm

It Did Its Work Too Well

By EDNA BLAKEMAN
Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

"Did you lock the pantry door?" asked Mrs. Bradbury from her position halfway up the stairs.

Bradbury turned with a muttered exclamation and tramped back to the kitchen, where he rattled the pantry door viciously. "I knew I had locked it," he said in an injured tone, as they took up the line of march for the second floor.

Once more Mrs. Bradbury paused and hesitated. "I can't remember whether I closed that window in the living room. You know, I opened it for a breath of fresh air and Joe, do you mind going back and trying it?" she added persuasively.

Mr. Bradbury seriously objected. Mrs. Bradbury passed him with uplifted chin and sailed down the stairs, her husband sat down on the landing and yawned drearily.

When she returned he awaited her coming with a portentous frown creasing his handsome brow.

"Heard you trying the pantry door again—for the third or fourth time since we started upstairs. You tried the living room windows for the fourth time and the parlor for the third time."

"I feel much more relieved in mind after I've tried them several times," said Louise amiably. "Let me pass—there's a good boy, thanks. You know I always let Bridget look the kitchen, only tonight she's out, and I wanted to make sure everything was all right."

"Dear," said his wife seriously, "you are so very clever, don't you believe you might invent a burglar alarm, one that would prevent any one from entering the house at night?"

"I'll try, my love," promised Bradbury, ruffling his head in perplexity.

"CLEVER, ISN'T IT?"

"I might as well put in my spare time trying to invent something. Perhaps I can make a go of it."

"Will you put it in the market, Joe?" she asked, running a comb through her golden hair.

"Certainly."

"What are you going to call it?" "It will have to have a name."

"I shall call it 'Bradbury's Burglar Alarm,' said the inventor after some thought.

"Call it 'The Bradbury Burglar Alarm.' It's ever so much better sounding," urged Louise, ringing a golden bell over her shoulder.

"Nothing like matter with that either," assented Mr. Bradbury, jotting it down in his notebook.

Many weeks ensued before any mention was made of the burglar alarm. In the meantime Joseph Bradbury each night followed his wife from window to window of their little home trying each catch and lock after she had fastened it and then waiting patiently afterward while she once more made the rounds.

As time went on Mr. Bradbury spent much time of evenings at his own special desk in the corner sketching plans and making elaborate calculations on scraps of paper.

One Thursday night Mr. Bradbury hurried home from the office at 5 o'clock. He came out on the trolley, and with him he carried a shabby leather suitcase which hung heavily from one hand.

"What have you got, dear?" Mrs. Bradbury asked her husband and looked curiously at the suit case.

"Anything around?" asked Bradbury cautiously.

"Not a soul, Bridget's afternoon and evening, of course."

Bradbury knelt down before the case and opened it. Within was a tangle of wires and rods and bolts. "I've got it!" he whispered.

"What is it?" She leaned over the suit case, her pretty face puckered with curiosity and impatience.

"The Bradbury Burglar Alarm," announced the inventor proudly.

"Then you did invent it?" she squealed joyfully.

"Sure I did. Now, I've made arrangements with the electric light plant to run a line down from their feed wire. It will connect with this and this and this," displaying the tangle of silk covered wire and other bits of mechanism.

All I've got to do is to switch on the current when I go to bed, and nobody can enter the house without being heard. Will ring all these eighteen bells I've got here and set off a signal down in the constable's office, besides turning on fifty colored electric lights here and giving the intruder a heavy shock of electricity. How's that? Go—some, eh?"

"Joseph Bradbury," said Louise, solemnly, "you are a wonderful man!"

"Nonsense, my dear," protested Bradbury, immensely flattered.

"When are you going to set it up?" she asked after awhile.

"After dinner. I've arranged for an electrician to be here, and we'll have the whole thing completed inside of a couple of hours. No need to do the lockstep tonight," he added jokingly.

"We'll leave that to the chap that tries to get inside, eh?"

Three hours afterward, as the clock was striking 10, Mr. Bradbury closed the door after the departing electrician and rubbed his hands delightedly.

"As all right now," he cried enthusiastically. "Let us be off to bed, Louise, and wait for our burglar, eh?"

I will not go into details concerning the Bradbury burglar alarm, for its inventor has not yet decided to place it on the market. It is sufficient to say that it was a pronounced success as evidenced by their trials that evening.

The electrician had tested the system by every clever device he could think of, but in every case he was utterly tripped by the delighted inventor.

The lights flashed wildly in all colors of the rainbow. The wires did not shock the electrician, for he wore rubber gloves, nor did the bell ring in the constable's office, for they cut off that connection, too, but in the matter of colored lights the alarm did work beautifully, while the eighteen bells jangled delightfully.

"I wish all these wires and things didn't have to be so exposed," complained Mrs. Bradbury. "They look horrid hanging around the doors and windows. Seems to me, your invention might have been simpler, Joe. It spoils the artistic effect in the rooms."

"Better be safe than artistic," snapped Joe impatiently. "Ready to come up? Shall I turn out the lights?"

Halfway up the stairs Mrs. Bradbury paused and turned with a theatrical gesture. "Joe?"

"Well, what is it now?" he cried.

"Rest easy about the pantry door—that's fastened all right."

"Isn't that your best overcoat?"

"What about it?"

"I left it on the clothesline. I put it out to air. It smelled of camphor, and I forgot to bring it in."

"I'll get it. Hold the candle while I disconnect this—there, confound it! I've dropped that little plug down the register grille. I can't get out of the house, Louise, until that plug is found—understand? Until that plug is found," Mr. Bradbury's voice showed the strain of an overworked stock of patience.

"Why can't you go outside, Joe? Do you mean that we're inside—held prisoners by that burglar alarm?" Mrs. Bradbury was frightened.

"You have stated the cold facts in the case," returned her husband. "This little plug is my own device. When it is removed from this hole the current is on all around the house. When I thrust the plug in the current is off—just the reverse of the usual method. Under, isn't it?"

"Very," said his wife, the drily.

That was the beginning of a strenuous night. The furnace pipe that led to the hall register down, which Bradbury had dropped his plug was taken down and found empty. Then it was replaced amid much dust and disorder in the cellar and the search continued all over the hall floor without result.

At midnight Mrs. Bradbury suggested that they run the risk of losing Mr. Bradbury's best overcoat and go to bed, as that gentleman had just made an unsuccessful attempt to escape from the house by a second story window.

It was then that Bridget Laidan arrived home, weary after a long afternoon of unalloyed pleasure. Her knock on the kitchen door was followed by an ear-splitting shriek that brought the neighborhood out of their beds.

Then it was that the Bradbury burglar alarm demonstrated its efficiency. The colored lights flashed intermittently all over the house; the eighteen bells rang incessantly; the constable and his aid rattled up on motor cycles, while Miss Laidan proceeded to read the air with her cries of pain.

When the tumult was over, when the current had been shut off from the feed wire and Bridget had been released from her unhappy position more frightened than hurt, for the current had not been a very heavy one after all, when the constable had been liberally fed for his trouble and all the neighbors had enjoyed their laugh in the utmost, Mr. Bradbury slammed the front door victoriously upon the outside world and returned to his wife.

"Now, what are you going to do, Joe? You look desperate. Bridget says she brought in your overcoat at 2 o'clock, so you need not have tried to get out and."

"My dear," said Bradbury with a great effort at self control. "Good night!"

Then when he was alone Mr. Bradbury proceeded to undo his earlier work of the evening. He tore down all his wires and other adjustments and restored the house to its artistic atmosphere. What he did with the debris from this deputation is not recorded.

When he had finished he went carefully around the house and locked each window and door. Then he made a second trip and tested each one.

"What are you doing, Joe?" called Louise from the stairs.

"The lockstep," granted Mr. Bradbury, with a grim smile at his own wit.

KEEPING BOYS ON FARMS.

Government's Corn Club Movement Found to Interest the Youngsters.

In a farmers' bulletin describing demonstration work on southern farms the United States department of agriculture declares that "one of the outgrowths of the demonstration work is the boys' corn club movement. We were in a position, through our organization and our force in the field, to perfect the corn club idea and give the instructions necessary to systematize it. Under our supervision every boy on 114 farms a definite place of ground under definite instruction will give him an exact knowledge of the

THE BOY AND THE CROP—FIRST THE BOY BECAME INTERESTED; THEN HE GAVE THIS CORN CLUB A TRY.

how to work large crops. One of the strong features of the demonstration work is that it is co-operative, and in the boys' work we frequently find the other staff forces of the county—the superintendent of public education, the teachers, the business men, the newspapers and the parents—all giving aid and support.

In Holmes county, Miss., in 1909 our boys' corn clubs produced crops averaging seventy-six bushels of corn per acre. The corn grown by their fathers and the neighbors averaged about sixteen bushels. This, with the results in other counties, was sufficient to arouse the state of Mississippi and create an overwhelming public sentiment in our favor. From a total enrollment of 10,543 during that year the movement grew until the year 1910 recorded an enrollment in the various states of 46,225 boys.

We have some cases where the boys of one county are challenging the boys of another county to a contest in corn production.

"One of our requirements, which has had a very beneficial effect, is that the proceeds of the acre shall go to the boy."

"We have also a system which will prove equally effective for the girls of the rural schools, so that the whole school can be instructed in a practical way."

FEEDING VALUE OF OATS.

Analyses of Straw and Grain Made by Federal Agricultural Department.

The analyses of oat straw show that this roughage well deserves its reputation as the best of its class for feeding. In protein and fat it is higher in feeding value than wheat, barley or rye straw, while in carbohydrates there is little difference.

Found for pound in its natural condition it is also unalterably better than corn stover on account of the greater moisture content of the latter, but the dry matter in corn stover is rather richer in food constituents than that in oat straw.

Oat hay is shown to be slightly inferior to barley hay in feeding value, but it ranks higher than timothy hay in protein and fat and in consequence is a slightly better feed. Hay made from the bearded varieties of barley is sometimes not readily eaten by stock on account of the beards. The waste thus occasioned makes oat hay fully as valuable ton for ton as hay made from bearded barley.

Oats cut green for feeding contain less water than either corn or rye. The superiority of oats over rye for soiling is particularly noticeable, as the oats are much higher in total food value.

Green oats contain quite favorably for pound for pound with green clover.

The feeding value of any article depends not only on its chemical composition, but on the digestibility of the matter it contains. It may contain a very high composition of valuable food materials, but if this material cannot be in such form that animals are not able to digest it. While the hull of oats contains little that is digestible, it serves to lighten the grain ration and to give bulk and in that way aids the complete digestion of the grain. Oats contain more digestible protein than barley or corn and nearly as much as wheat. This grain is also much higher in fat than barley or wheat and practically as high as corn. In carbohydrates, the cheapest portion of the food, oats are considerably lower than any of the other grains. Oat straw ranks much higher in digestible protein and fat than the straw from any of the other grains and nearly as high in carbohydrates. It contains less protein than corn stover, but more of the other food constituents. Oat hay is higher than timothy hay in all the digestible nutrients.

The best farmer is the man who keeps his best horse and cart on his farm, and he is up to the hills and valleys. Also, he is an animal lover, he must do the same by his horse.

To Keep Horses Where They Belong. This will illustrate a contrivance which I am using, says a correspondent of the National Stockman and Farmer. It became necessary some time to pasture adjoining fields with cattle and horses, leaving the horses in either field. My plan is this: Nail boards from the ground up, say about sixteen inches, at or upon the main gate posts. Then plant two stub posts, say about fourteen inches from each post, nailing boards to them also, same height. The principal is this: The cattle and horses can step over or between these obstructions, while the dogs cannot jump them. They can go through or between, but in order to jump our dogs must "square" him, as this last arrangement prevents him from taking this square position.

Shutting Off Drafts. Every crack, crevice or hole in or about the windows in which plants are kept during winter should be closed by pasting paper over the smaller ones, stuffing with soft paper or rags the larger and wherever it can be employed filling with well beaten putty.

Poultry Pointers. Most farmers keep too many roosters in proportion to the hens. This is a prime cause of infertility in eggs. An overfertilized egg is often yolkless and is always infertile. One cock to ten to fifteen hens is sufficient.

The main factor in securing success with poultry in winter lies in the hen-house being perfectly dry and warm with sufficient light and ventilation. Beware of providing too much ventilation, for in winter that means frozen combs, colds and kindred evils.

Poorly dressed poultry goes begging in the market, while the supply of choice (fancy) stock is not sufficient to meet the demand.

A box of granulated charcoal should be kept in the poultry house. If fowls or chicks have access to charcoal they will never be troubled with intestinal worms.

High grade manure will be wanted next spring for garden work, and it will pay to collect and care for the poultry droppings.

In breeding ducks new drakes should be introduced into the flock each year. New blood should be introduced every time any of the young birds are used.

Every poultryman should lay in a supply of alfalfa or clover for his fowls during the winter months. Green food is as essential as grain for the egg layers.

Crowns make pretty borders when planted on the lawn in front of tall plants or hedges. Plant them liberally if you wish their splendid effect.

If you observe that the shoots on your trees grow only five or six inches every year you may know the soil needs to be enriched. The growth ought to be from fifteen to thirty inches every season.

Remove every dead tree from the orchard. They are veritable breeding places for fruit pests.

On every acre of fruit, whether for local markets or for shipment, the wholesale trade should have the name and address of the grower. Only those who have inferior fruit can afford to neglect this.

tured way, but her gray hair was there and her face laid with a network of fretful lines. Her color was bad. At the moment her cheeks were yellow and sunken.

She complained of being short of breath and lame and tired. "I'm always tired," she explained. "Pears like sometimes I can't scarcely drag myself around, but I do."

A pang of comprehending pain shot through Virginia's heart. If she could not love she could at least pity and help, and reaching forth her hand, she patted her mother on the knee. "Poor old mammy," she said. "I'm going to help you."

"Lize was touched by this action of her proud daughter and smiled sadly. "This is no place for you. It's nothing but a measly little cow town gone to seed—and I'm gone to seed with it. I know it. But what is a feller to do? I'm stuck here, and I've got to make a living or quit. I can't quit, so I stagger along."

"I've come back to help you, mother. You must let me relieve you of some of the burden."

"What can you do, child?" Lize asked gently.

"I can teach."

"Not in this town you can't."

"Why not?"

"Well, there's a terrible prejudice against—well, against me. And, besides, the places are all filled for next year. The Wetherfords, ain't among the first circles any more."

"MOTHER, DON'T YOU KNOW ME?" Lee Virginia remembered Gregg's charge against her mother. "What do you mean by the prejudice against you?" she asked.

Lize was evasive. "Since I took to running this restaurant my old friends kind of fell off, but never mind that tonight."

The girl's thought was now turned into other half forgotten channels. "I wish you would tell me more about father. I don't remember where he was buried."

"Neither do I, child. I mean I don't know exactly. You see, after that cattle war he went away to Texas. He never came back and never wrote, and by and by word came that he had died and was buried, but I never could go down to see where his grave was at."

"Didn't you know the name of the town?"

"Yes, but it was a new place away down in the Panhandle and nobody I knew lived there. And I never knew anything more. Well, I must go back into the restaurant. I haven't got a girl I can trust to count the cash."

Left alone, Lee Virginia went no more, but her face settled into an expression of stern sadness. It seemed as if her girlhood had died out of her and that she was about to begin the same struggle with work and worry which had marked the lives of all the women she had known in her childhood.

CHAPTER II THE FOREST RANGER.

LEE VIRGINIA was awakened next morning by the passing of some one down the hall culling at each door, "Six o'clock!" She had not slept at all till after 1. She was lame, heart weary and dismayed, but she rose and dressed herself as neatly as before. She had decided to return to Sulphur. "I cannot endure this," she had repeated to herself a hundred times. "I will not!"

Hearing the clatter of dishes, she ventured with desperate courage into the dining room, which was again filled with cowboys, coal miners, ranchers and their tumbled families and certain nondescript town loafers of tramp-like appearance.

Slipping him a seat at the end of the table which offered the cleanest cloth, Lee Virginia glanced round upon her neighbors with shivering eyes. All were shoveling their food with knife blades and guzzling their coffee with bent heads. Their faces scoured her, and she dropped her eyes.

At her left, however, sat two men whose greetings were frank and manly and whose table manners betrayed a higher form of life. One of them was a tall man with a lean red face, against which his blond mustache lay like a chalk mark. He wore a corduroy jacket cut in Norfolk style, and in the collar of his yellow shirt a green tie was loosely knotted. His hands were long and freckled, but were manifestly trained to polite usages.

The other man was younger and browner and of a compact, athletic figure. On the breast of his olive green coat hung a silver badge which bore a pine tree in the center. His shirt was tan colored and rough, but his head was handsome. He looked like a young officer in the undress uniform of the regular army. His hands were strong, but rather small, and the lines of his shoulders graceful. Most attractive of all were his eyes, so brown, so quietly humorous and so keen.

In the rumble of cheap and vulgar talk the voices of these men appealed to the troubled girl with great charm. She felt more akin to them than to any one else in the room, and from time to time she raised her eyes to their faces.

They were aware of her also, and their gaze was frankly admiring as well as wondering, and in passing the ham and eggs or the sugar they contrived to show her that they considered her a lady in a rough place and that they would like to know more about her.

She accepted their civilities with gratitude and listened to their talk with growing interest. It seemed that the young man had come down from the hills to meet his friend and take him back to his cabin.

"I can't do it today, Ross," said the older man. "I wish I could, but one meal of this kind is all I can stand these days."

Mrs. Wetherford, seizing the moment, came down to do the honors. "You fellows ought to know my girl, Virginia," this is Forest Supervisor Redfield, and this is Ross Cavanagh, his forest ranger in this district. You ought to know each other. My girl's just back from school, and she don't think much of the Fork. It's a little too coarse for her."

Lee flushed under this introduction, and her distress was so evident that both men came to her rescue.

The older man bowed and said, "I didn't know you had a daughter, Mrs. Wetherford." And Cavanagh, with a glance of admiration, added, "We've been wondering who you might be."

Lize went on: "I thought I'd got rid of her. She's been away now for about ten years. I don't know but it was a mistake. Look's like she's grown a little too fine haired for us doughies out here."

"So much the worse for us," replied Redfield.

This little dialogue gave the girl time to recover herself, but as Cavanagh watched the blush fade from her face, leaving it cold and white, he sympathized with her—pitying her from the bottom of his heart. He perceived that he was a chance spectator of the first scene in a painful domestic drama—one that might easily become a tragedy. He wondered what the forces might be which had brought such a daughter to this shabby, this dingy. To see a maid of this delicate bloom thrust into such a place as Lize Wetherford's "hotel" had the reputation of being roused indignation.

"When did you reach town?" he asked, and into his voice his admiration crept.

"Only last night."

"You find great changes here?"

"Not so great as in my mother. It's all—"

She stopped abruptly, and he understood.

Lize being drawn back to her cash register, Redfield turned to say: "My dear young lady, I don't suppose you remember me, but I knew you when you were a tot of five or six. I knew your father very well."

"Did you?" Her face lighted up.

"Yes, poor fellow; he went away from here rather under a cloud, you know."

"I remember a little of it. I was here when the shooting took place."

"So you were. Well, since then much has happened to us all," he explained to the ranger. "There wasn't room for a dashing young blood such as Ed Wetherford was in those days. He turned to Lee."

"He was no worse than the men on the other side—it was dog eat dog—but some way the people rather settled on him as a scapegoat. He was forced out, and your mother has borne the brunt of it since. Those were lawless days."

More and more Lee Virginia's heart went out in trust toward these two men. Opposed to the mindless, uncharitable through which filled the room, they seemed wondrously softened and sympathetic, and in the ranger's gaze was something else—something which made her troubles somehow less intolerable. She felt that he understood the difficult situation in which she found herself.

Redfield went on. "You find us horribly uncivilized after ten years' absence?"

"I find this uncivilized," she replied, with fierce intensity, looking around the room. Then, on the impulse, she added: "I can't stand it! I came here to live with my mother, but this is too—too horrible!"

"I understand your repulsion," replied Redfield. "A thousand times I repeat, uproot of this country. Where every prospect pleases and only man is vile."

"Do you suppose it was as bad ten years ago?" she asked. "Was every thing as dirty—as mean? Were the houses then as full of flies and smells?"

"I'm afraid they were. Of course the country isn't all like this, and there are neat homes and gentle people in Sulphur, but most cattlemen are not. They're always been a shiftless, happy-go-lucky lot at best, and some of them have been worse, as you know."

"I never dreamed of finding my mother in such a place," she went on. "I don't know what to do or say. She isn't well. I ought to stay and help her, and yet—oh, it is disheartening!"

Lee impetuously laid on the shoulder. "Come over here, Reddy, if you have finished your breakfast, I want to talk with you."

Redfield rose and followed his lady behind the counter and they sat in earnest conversation while she made change. The time in which her mother addressed the supervisor, her action of touching him as one man lays hand upon another, was profoundly revolting to Lee Virginia. She revolted from it without realizing exactly what it meant, and feeling deeply but vaguely the forest ranger's sympathy, she asked:

"How can you endure this kind of life?"

"I can't, and I don't," he answered cautiously, for they were being closely observed. "I am seldom in town. My doubtless is more than a mile above this level. My cabin is 3000 feet above the sea. It is clean and quiet up there."

"Are all the other restaurants in the village like this?"

"Worse. I come here because it is the best."

She rose. "I can't stand this air and these flies any longer. They're too disgusting."

He followed her into the other house, conscious of the dismay and bitterness which burst forth the instant they were alone. "What am I to do? She is my mother, but I've lost all sense of relationship to her. And these people, except you and Mr. Redfield, are all disgusting to me. It isn't because my mother is poor. It isn't because she's keeping boarders; it's something else." At this point her voice failed her.

"Let us go out into the air," suggested the ranger presently. "The mountain wind will do you good."

She followed him trustfully, and as she stepped from the squalor of the hotel into the splendor of the morning her head lifted. She drank the clear, crisp wind as one takes water in the desert.

"The air is clean, anyway," she said. Cavanagh to divert her pointed away to the mountains. "There is my doubtless. Up there I am sole ruler. No one can litter the earth with corruption or poison the streams."

She did not speak, but as she studied the ranger her face cleared. "It is beautiful up there."

He went on. "I hate all this scrap heap quite as heartily as you do, but up there are sweetness and sanity. The streams are germless, and the forest cannot be devastated. That is why I am a ranger. I could not endure life in a town like this."

He turned up the street toward the high hill to the south, and she kept step with him. As she did not speak, he asked, "What did you expect to do out here?"

"I hoped to teach," she replied, her voice still choked with her emotion. "I expected to find the country much improved."

"And so it is, but it is still a long way from an eastern state. Perhaps you will find the people less savage than they appear at first glance."

"It isn't the town or the people; it is my mother," she burst forth again. "Tell me! A woman in the car yesterday accused my mother of selling whisky unlawfully. Is this so? Tell me!"

She faced him resolutely, and, perceiving that she could not be evaded, he made slow answer. "I don't know how she does, but I've heard it charged against her."

"Who made the charge?"

"One of the clergymen, and then it's common talk among the rough men of the town."

"But she's my mother!" wailed the girl, coming back to the central fact. "She has sent me money—she has been kind to me. What am I to do? She needs me, and yet the thought of staying here and facing her life frightens me."

The rotten board walks, the low rookeries, the unshaven, bear-eyed men sitting on the thresholds of the saloons, the slattern squaws wandering abroad like bedraggled hens, made the girl start with wonder and dismay. She had remembered the town street as a highway filled with splendid cavaliers, a list wherein heroic deeds were done with horse and pistol.

SPREAD MANURE IN FALL.

Old Practice of Keeping Until Spring Generally Abandoned.

The old method of keeping all the manure gathered under the farm and spreading it in the spring is practiced but little at present, says a correspondent of the American Cultivator.

There is a time perhaps during the month of October when the average farmer is too busy husking corn and getting ready for winter to stop to haul manure out every day, or every few days. But after this rush period the manure should be hauled out every few days and spread broadcast.

This method is very advantageous in that it will give the horses exercise through the winter. It does not take long each day and cuts out the task of hauling manure continually for two or three weeks in the busy spring season.

By hauling out as soon as it is made all danger from heating is done away with and the valuable constituents of the manure are saved. Nitrogen, one of the most valuable constituents of manure, is often lost by heating when in piles.

Carefully conducted experiments at the Massachusetts experiment station tend to show there is no loss in richness when the manure is spread broadcast in the winter. A difference is always noted for the better in this method over the other way of waiting until spring and spreading.

Even though the lumps of manure freeze while in the field, it has been shown that this is just what the manure needs. The action of the weather on the various constituents is just what is needed to make the manure more available as a plant food.

The possibility of washing is practically the only objection against winter spreading, but applies only to hilly land. With the exception of these very sloping lands it is found advisable to cart during the winter in practically all cases. It is beneficial both as a saving of time and as a benefit to the soil.

All cases are promptly paid in full by the insurance companies I represent, Myrtie Young.

ALWAYS NEEDS ATTENTION.

From the Very Instant of Completion Either Gravel or Stone Road Begins to Deteriorate, and the Longer It Is Neglected the More It Will Cost to Repair.

Following is an extract from "The Maintenance of Gravel and Broken Stone Roads," written by Daniel N. Lanten, Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind., in State's Duty.

A Test.

"If after a hard winter's frost the sides of a gravel pit remain steep without caving it may be taken as a satisfactory test that that gravel is a suitable road material."

"When a business man invests money in a business project, such as for instance, the purchase of houses for renting, he finds it to his interest to keep those houses in good repair. If the roof begins to leak it must be attended to at once or the interior may be ruined. If furnace or chimney flues become defective they must be repaired before the dwelling is endangered by fire. So it should be with our highways. A good road surface must not only support loads, but it must act as a roof to shield the softer foundation from moisture. A leak in the surface of a road may be as disastrous to the capital invested as a leak in the roof of a dwelling."

Road Deteriorates.

DUST LAYING.

Oil Used by Canadian Town to Sprinkle Streets.

Owen Sound is located results in very dusty streets. No matter how much rain falls or how much water is sprinkled on the streets in an hour thereafter the dust becomes a nuisance and a menace to health. To overcome this the municipal authorities experimented with oil, which proved such a success that now all the principal streets in the town are oiled. These thoroughfares are macadamized and are first swept clean and the oil put on immediately after with the sprinkler.

"The objection at first was that the odor from the crude oil was offensive, but in a day or two this disappeared, and the change for the better to dustless streets was recognized by all. The first application of oil lasted six weeks, and the second application was put on the other day, and what were some of the dustiest streets are now perfectly dustless.

"The town officials state that it will be an annual saving of $25,000 over the old water system and at the same time give much better results."

There are no dusts in the town of Owen Sound. No dust, no dirt, no houses of infamy, no schools of crime. All there are are clean, healthy, well-lit roads, especially in the winter.

GRADES ON HIGHWAYS.

There are Four Per Cent Slope Advisable For Heavy Traffic.

A 4 per cent grade on a road means a rise of one foot for each hundred feet of distance traveled up the hill. A 10 per cent grade means ten feet rise in each hundred feet so traveled.

A 1 per cent grade, then, means that in traveling uphill one mile an ascent is made of 52.8 feet, while a 10 per cent grade means a rise in altitude of 528 feet in a mile. Accurate tests have shown that a horse which can pull 1000 pounds on a level road can pull only 800 pounds on a rise of one foot in fifty, and on a rise of one foot in ten he can pull only 250 pounds.

These facts show that the greatest load that can be hauled over a road is the load which can be taken up the steepest hill on that road or through the deepest mudhole. It is therefore advised that all highways traveled by heavily loaded vehicles should be kept within a 3 or 4 per cent grade if practicable. To do this may require a change of location to get around hills, always keeping in mind that the lower the grade the larger the load may be hauled and the cost of hauling kept at the lowest point.

Good roads are the earmarks of civilization, the emblem of intelligence, education and refinement, whereas bad roads are the sign of backwardness, intolerance and indifferent citizenship.

ONE WAY TO BETTER ROADS.

Automobile Club Gives Free Drags to Farmers.

A plan inaugurated several months ago by the Manhattan (Kan.) Motor club has been successful in bettering the condition of the country roads in a radius of ten miles from Manhattan at least 50 per cent, and the plan is so inexpensive that the club is urging other towns to take it up.

The club gives a road drag to every farmer who will guarantee to use it to keep three miles of road in good condition. The club has given away more than forty drags and is getting calls for them at the rate of about four a week.

The club first made the offer several months ago. The farmers were slow in taking advantage of it, but a few days ago the club's president, Dr. J. D. Cull, advertised the offer in the local newspapers, and the result has been that the drags are being taken by the farmers as fast as the club can get them made. The club has placed no limit on the territory in which the offer is good, and the drags are in use in all sections of the county. They cost the club about $6 each.

Are you in favor of good roads? If not you don't belong to this age of the world and this town is no place for you.

Tar on English Roads.

The county surveyors in England have reported that the tarring of roads has resulted in a saving of 20 to 25 per cent of the cost of the road maintenance. The average cost of spraying with tar is $195 per mile. Experienced men say that it pays to spend this much for tarring the roads that cost $750 to $1000 per mile a year for maintenance. Nothing more satisfactory than tar has been found. Two methods are used in applying it. If the road is resurfaced the material is previously saturated with tar. On roads that are not used for much such treatment will last two or six years.

The other system is to spread hot tar on the surface, and this has proved to be more than a dust protector. It makes the road waterproof and binds together the material, making it more resistant to water, wheels and loads.

The sand and oil roads of California are said to be waterproof.

CHERRIES IN THIS REGION

Which May Well be Called Cherry Belt of the World

ARTICLE IN "ORANGE JUDD FARMER"

Written By Professor Taft of Michigan Agricultural College.

Orchards Often Yield Three to Five Hundred Dollars Per Acre—Orchard of Paul Rose "The Cherry King".

In the issue of the Orange Judd Farmer, Chicago, for January 14th, there is an article by Prof. L. R. Taft of the Michigan Agricultural college, regarding the adaptability of the Grand Traverse region for the growing of cherries, particularly sweet cherries. The article which is worth reading is as follows:

While the southern half of Michigan's fruit belt has been justly famed for its peach orchards, for a number of years the northern portion, while also claiming first honors for the certainty of its apple and peach crops, has been rapidly coming to the front as a cherry growing section. While the sour varieties succeed in all parts of the state, the regularity and abundance of the crop nowhere else equals the showing that is annually made in what may well be called the cherry belt of Michigan.

It is not for the production of sweet cherries, however, that the so-called Grand Traverse region is particularly famed. The trees not only seem healthier and longer lived than in other sections, but they are unusually productive and the fruit reaches a size that rivals that of the famed cherries from Oregon. The trees come quickly into bearing and it is not uncommon for them to produce four to six cases, 16 quarts when four years old, and then increase this yield one case annually, so that a tree that is 16 years old will bear that number of cases or eight bushels. At the crop ripens in July and August, after the cherries are off the market, the fruit always brings a good price, ranging from $2.50 to $4.00 per bushel for the sour varieties and from $3.50 to $11.25 per bushel for sweet cherries. It is not uncommon to have well-known sweet cherries sell for $6 to $8 per bushel, and when packed in ten pound boxes they really bring $1.50 to $2.25, or $7.50 to $11.25 per bushel. Six-year-old orchards often yield $300 to $500 per acre, when planted to good, commercial sorts upon reasonably favorable sites and given fair care.

The orchardist who is perhaps best known as a cherry grower both on account of the skill shown in the growing of the fruit and with which the crop is handled and marketed, as well as the resulting returns, is Paul Rose of South Frankfort, who is often spoken of as the cherry king of Michigan. Mr. Rose was wise in selecting a location for his fruit farm, which is upon the high ridge between Lake Michigan and the Betsey river, which empties into Lake Michigan at Frankfort. The land is a clay loam, originally covered with beech and maple, and occupies a plateau with an elevation of 200 to 250 feet, from which there is a rapid slope to north and west, thus favoring the dropping of the cold air to the lower levels and giving a temperature that is often ten degrees higher in extreme cold weather than at Frankfort, four miles away.

The elevation, combined with the northern latitude and the proximity of Lake Michigan, has much to do with the regularity of the crop, as the weather during the winter is quite uniform, thus preventing the early starting of the buds, and lessening the danger from late frosts in the spring. The fruit also develops ten days later than upon lower sites, especially those farther away from the cooling winds of Lake Michigan, which often has a material effect upon the price secured.

The orchards first planted are twelve to fifteen years old and are pictures of perfect health. The trees are grown with trunks about two feet high and the tops are symmetrical and rounded, except those of some of the sweet varieties, which are naturally vase-shaped. While the trees are young care is taken to form the shade, but after that very little pruning is given.

As the trees are planted twenty feet apart each way, it gives room at first for growing some hoed crop between the rows, but after they come into bearing the land is given up entirely to the orchard. During spring and early summer it is worked occasionally to keep down the weeds and conserve the moisture thus hastening the growth and development of the trees much more rapid than light, sandy soils which are so often used for the cherry. As soon as the crop is harvested a cover crop is sown.

Mr. Rose is a believer in the use of the spray pump, and sprays his trees before the blossoms open and from one to three times after the fruit has set. As a result of this treatment, very little harm is experienced from either fungi or insects. The benefit seems to last from year to year.

The leading varieties grown are Early Purple, Schmidt-Bigarsu and Windsor of the sweet sorts and Early Richmond and Montmorency of the sour cherries. The sweet cherries are packed in ten-pound boxes, the upper layer being carefully faced, and a ready market is found in Toledo, Pittsburg and Cincinnati. As a rule the sour cherries are marketed in sixteen-quart crates and Detroit has generally given the best returns.

TREATMENT OF TREES

Professor Taft Gives Method for San Jose Scale

Best Results Obtained When Spraying the Latter Part of March.

When trees are of poor varieties, or if it is not deemed worth while to spray them, they should be destroyed at once as they will never give fruit of any value and will serve to spread the scale to neighboring trees.

PRUNING BEFORE SPRAYING.
In order to do the best work, the trees should be pruned, removing all dead branches and cutting back others that have been seriously injured, or that are very high. All surplus shoots and branches that can be spared from the trees should be cut away thus both reducing the surface to be sprayed and making it possible to do a better job when spraying for the scale.

TIME AND METHOD OF SPRAYING.
The best results are secured when the spraying is done during the latter part of March, or before growth has started, although if the trees are badly infested they should be sprayed in the fall and again in the spring. The most effective remedy is lime-sulphur solution, using the commercial mixtures at the rate of one part to ten parts of water; or, one to eight if the trees are badly encrusted. Be sure to spray the trees from all sides and cover every portion from the ground to the ends of the branches. If the spraying has been omitted, it will lessen the injury to the trees if they are sprayed about the first of July and again the first of September when the young scales are upon the trees, using one part to thirty parts of water for apple and pear trees; one to sixty for plum and cherry and one to one hundred upon peach and Japanese plums.

MESSAGE FROM KANSAS

Subject of Governor Hoch's Lecture February 9

Judge Alden's Lecture was the Best Ever Heard in the City.

The lecture by Judge Alden at the Charlevoix theater Friday night was pronounced by everybody the best lecture ever heard in the city. The next number will be February 7, when Governor Hoch will deliver a message from Kansas.

Governor Hoch of Kansas is truly a man of the people. Unlike most of the big features of the present day, it has always seemed to me a delight for him to grasp the heart of each member of his audience and they have crowded around him in their enthusiasm for the lecture. Very few men in America have accomplished during their administration as governor as much as did Governor Hoch in Kansas. There is not space enough here to mention all the things which he championed and which crystallized into law during his administration: Oil legislation, for example, was passed which made it possible in three years to establish nineteen independent oil refineries and an unusual saving of one million dollars to the consumers of coal oil in Kansas.

An entire change of management was brought about in the state institutions putting them on a civil service basis, resulting in a wonderful increase in their efficiency. A series of railroad laws, unequalled in number by those of any other state were enacted during his administration. Two cent fares were secured, an anti-pass law enacted, also a drastic pure food law, a juvenile court law, and a judicial pay roll law which will restore many adult offenders to good citizenship. A depository law for state funds was passed which is yielding nearly $2000 per month to the state. The enforcement of state prohibition was a notable feature of his administration.

The Topeka Herald says of Governor Hoch, that he is one of the few men in Kansas who can prepare an address while the audience waits. The Worthington, Minnesota Herald, "The zenith of the Chatauqua was reached when Governor Hoch was introduced."

The Tama, Iowa, News said, "He spoke to the largest audience of the Assembly up to the time this is written. He is in the class with La Follette of Wisconsin, Cummings of Iowa, Folk of Missouri and Hanley of Indiana."

The following letter was received from Boyne City, dated January 28, 1911:

Dear Mr. DeVoe:
"This is to congratulate you and your lecture course patrons upon having completed arrangements with Hon. E. W. Hoch for his famous lecture, 'A Message from Kansas.'"

"Mr. Hoch lectured in Boyne City last November and many of our citizens are still talking about him. You cannot advertise him too strongly or too extensively. To hear him is worth the entire cost of the season ticket. He strikes a responsive chord in the heart of everyone within the first five minutes from the beginning of his lecture, and to the young men he is wonderfully inspiring. Judge Harris said the next morning after hearing Mr. Hoch that he would not have had his son miss the lecture for five dollars."

Wishing you success, I remain,
Fraternally yours,
L. H. RUTLER, Supt. Schools.

EIGHTEEN COUNTIES

Will Vote on the Question of Local Option This Spring.

The entire staff of the Michigan Anti-saloon league met in Adrian last week and outlined a plan for the most vigorous spring campaign ever worked out by the organization. The following dry counties are ready to resubmit the question: Calhoun, Jackson, Allegan, Ionia, Genesee, Sanilac, Tuscola, Newaygo, Clare, Benzie and Emmet. Wet counties in which there will be a fight on this spring are Huron, Iosca, Alpena, Montmorency, Cheboygan, Montcalm and Kalamazoo, making a total of eighteen counties in which the anti-saloon league will fight the liquor forces. The big fight in the wet counties will be in Kalamazoo and among the dry counties Jackson will put up the stiffest opposition.

FROM HIS HOME

Strong Endorsement of the Candidacy of E. N. Clink

In The Charlevoix County Herald of January 28, 1911

Many of our local citizens, as well as many men of influence throughout the district have been urging Attorney E. N. Clink to become a candidate for the Republican nomination for Circuit Judge of the Thirteenth Judicial Circuit, to succeed Judge F. W. Mayne of Charlevoix.

Attorney Clink is so well known, not alone in his home town here, but throughout the district, that anything The Herald might say would seem superfluous. The gentleman has had a wide experience in the law business and has been very successful, and while many attorneys make enemies Mr. Clink has the faculty of coming out of a trial with friends on both sides of the case. He has had a large law practice in both Charlevoix and Antrim Counties, and has had a wide experience in nearly every court in Northern Michigan as well as other places.

Should Mr. Clink become a candidate he will without doubt get from 90 to 95 per cent of the votes in South Arm township and will command a large vote wherever he is best known.

Mr. Clink was Postmaster of East Jordan several years, and served as Prosecuting Attorney of Charlevoix County one term, declining to become a candidate for a second term owing to his rapidly increasing private practice.

Judge Mayne was appointed Circuit Judge to fill a vacancy and since then has served two full terms of six years.

The Thirteenth Judicial Circuit comprises the counties of Charlevoix, Antrim, Grand Traverse and Leelanau. The nomination will be under the primary system, March 1 being the date.

Sec. 8. Clarifies the meaning of a section, the present working of which is ambiguous regarding whose duty it is to furnish ballots. To require the providing of ballots at the polling places for use by challenged voters when voting machines are used.

Sec. 9. Empowers saloons or anti-saloon committees to appoint challengers at the polls on election day.

Sec. 10. Provides for a recount and review by the courts.

Sec. 13. Changes period between elections from two to four years.

Sec. 16. Cuts out of resolution adopted by the board declaring questions carried requirement to designate a particular paper for publication of notice.

Sec. 16. Makes a fine or imprisonment for first offense optional with the court.

Sec. 38. (a) Makes the keeping of liquor in a "blind pig" prima facie evidence of a violation.

Sec. 40. Makes keeping of a place for the manufacture or sale of liquors in a dry county a nuisance.

TWENTY MILLION DOLLARS

Value of Michigan's Bean Crop for the Past Season of 1910.

When Michigan's bean crop of 1910 shall have been converted into the naked and other articles of food at most $20,000,000 will have been spent for the product by the people of the world. Reports show that Michigan grew 6,150,000 bushels last year, easily outranking any other state. The retail price of beans everywhere, excepting the selected, hand picked variety, is ten cents a quart.

While the crop was larger than in 1909 in some sections it was badly damaged by rains, so that the amount of merchantable beans is no greater than a year ago, hence the wholesale price is not apt to show much of a change, according to members of the Michigan Bean Jobbers' Association at the mid-winter meeting.

STRICT QUARANTINE

Secretary Shumway of State Board of Health

Visits Pellston and Orders the Enforcement of the Law.

Dr. Shumway, secretary of the state board of health, was in town last week and investigated the small-pox situation—and let us state in plain English that he pronounced it small-pox. After visiting several cases, he met with the village and township authorities and thoroughly went over the situation and issued instructions and orders he deemed necessary for the extermination of the disease.

The doctor ordered that the quarantine be immediately tightened up and that sufficient assistance be provided the health officer to enforce the laws, and that hereafter anyone caught breaking quarantine be arrested and prosecuted to the extent of the law. When a case was discovered, the entire family be placed in quarantine, or else the well ones be thoroughly disinfect and take up their residence elsewhere until the health officer permits their return home. In no case was anyone to be allowed in and out of an infected house. He also urged general vaccination and the opening of schools, but with the proviso that (Continued on page 6.)

Neighborhood Notes

The great power dam on the Menominee river, four miles above Iron Mountain, is being constructed. It is designed, when completed, to furnish power for, operating the mines in the vicinity and for lighting the city of Iron Mountain. It will be the biggest power project on the Menominee river.

The dam is being constructed on the lower of the Twin Falls which is 30 feet in height. The dam itself will be 40 feet high, making the entire elevation 70 feet. The dam is to be completed and in commission sometime during the present year.

Auditor General Fuller is of the opinion that the state board of equalization which will meet at Lansing, August 21, 1911, to equalize the state tax will boost the assessed valuation of Michigan to over $2,000,000,000. This board meets once every five years and is composed of the lieutenant governor, auditor general, secretary of the state, state treasurer and state land commissioner. At present the total valuation of all property in the state amounts to $1,734,100,000.

The National Boat and Engine company, the $10,000,000 boat combine recently organized of which the Racine Boat Co. of Muskegon is the head filed a trust mortgage with the register of deeds of Muskegon county for a bond issue of $3,000,000.

The railroads of the state, it is said, are preparing to advance freight rates on sugar beets from 40 to 50 cents a ton, and shippers from beet sections are sending complaints to the railroad commission. Chairman Glasgow said he would recommend to the shippers of sugar beets that they sell at the point from which the output is shipped and thus the freight weight would be figured by the railroad instead of the sugar company.

Under the system in vogue, the beets are not weighed at the shipping point, but at the sugar factory. Thus the farmer has to take the word of the sugar company as to the weight of his beets. It is also stated by those making complaints to the commission that the percentage of sugar is figured according to the distance from the point of shipment.

The proposition to enlarge the state house so that all departments can find quarters, including the railroad and the tax commission, the dairy and food and the labor department and others which have to rent buildings, is again in contemplation. To enlarge the state house to meet all demands for accommodations at present would cost, it is estimated, $1,000,000.

Representative Rindabough, the Lansing city member, says the matter of his introducing a bill to that effect is under consideration locally.

DON'T EXPERIMENT

You Will Make No Mistake If You Follow This Advice.

Never neglect your kidneys. If you have pain in the back, urinary disorders, dizziness and nervousness, it's time to act and no time to experiment. These are all symptoms of kidney trouble, and you should seek a remedy which is known to cure the kidneys.

Don's Kidney Pills is a remedy to use. No need to experiment. It has cured many stubborn cases in this vicinity.

Can Charlevoix residents demand further proof than that contained in the following testimonial?

George Holbrook, Main and Danforth Sts., Mancelona, Mich. says: "Don's Kidney Pills helped me wonderfully. I had an extremely lame back and there were acute pains in my loins when I stooped or lifted. My kidneys also bothered me considerably. After using Don's Kidney Pills, the lameness left my back and the kidney secretion became regular in passage. Since then I have been free from kidney disorders and consequently, I have no hesitation in giving Don's Kidney Pills, my endorsement."

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

By HAMLIN GARLAND

CHAPTER II—Continued.

She perceived in the ranger the man of the new order, and with this in her mind she said: "You don't belong here? You're not a western man?"

"Not in the sense of having been born here," he replied. "I am, in fact, a native of England, though I've lived nearly twenty years of my life in the States."

She glanced at his badge. "How did you come to be a ranger—what does it mean? It's all new to me."

"It is new to the west," he answered smilingly, glad of a chance to turn her thought from her own personal griefs. "It has all come about since you went east. Uncle Sam has at last become provident and is now conserving his resources. I am one of his representatives, with stewardship over some 90,000 acres of territory, mostly forest."

She looked at him with eyes of changing light. "You don't talk like an Englishman, and yet you are not like the men out here."

"I shouldn't care to be like some of them," he answered. "My being here is quite logical. I went into the cattle business like many another, and I went broke. I served under Colonel Roosevelt in the Cuban war and after my term was out naturally drifted back. I love the wilderness and have some natural taste for forestry, and I can ride and pack a horse as well as most cowboys; hence my uniform. I'm not the best forest ranger in the service, I'll admit, but I fancy I'm a fair average."

"And that is your badge—the pine tree?"

"Yes, and I am proud of it. Some of the fellows are not, but so far as I am concerned I'm glad to be known as a defender of the forest. A tree means much to me. I never mark one for felling without a sense of responsibility to the future."

Her questions came slowly. Like those of a child. "Where do you live?"

"Directly up the South Fork about twenty miles."

"What do you do?"

He smiled. "Not much. I ride the trails, guard the game, put out fires, scold lumber, burn brush, build bridges, herd cattle, count sheep, survey land and a few other odd chores. It's supposed to be a soft snap, but I can't see it that way."

"Do you live alone?"

"Yes, for the larger part of the time. I have an assistant, who is with me during part of the summer months. Mostly I am alone. However, I am supposed to keep open house, and I catch a visitor now and then."

"Do you expect to do this always?"

He smiled again. "There you touch my secret spring. I have the hope of being chief ranger some time—I mean we all have the prospect of promotion to sustain us. The service is so new that any one with even a knowledge of forestry is in demand. By and by real foresters will arise."

She returned abruptly to her own problem. "I dread to go back to my mother, but I must. Oh, how I hate that hotel! I loathe the flies, the smells, the people that eat there, the waiters—everything!" She shuddered.

"Many of the evils you mention could be reformed, except, of course, some of the people who come to eat. I fear several of them have gone beyond reformation."

As they started back down the street she saw the motor stage just leaving the door of the office. "That settles one question," she said. "I can't get away till tomorrow."

"Where would you go if you broke camp—back to the east?"

"No. My mother thinks there is a place for me in Sulphur City."

"Your case interests me deeply. I wish I could advise you to stay, but this is a rough town for a girl like you. Why don't you talk the problem over with the supervisor?" His voice became firmer. "Mrs. Redfield is the very one to help you."

"Where does she live?"

"Their ranch lies just above Sulphur, at the mouth of the canyon. May I tell him what you've told me? He's a good sort, is Redfield—much better able to advise than I am."

Cavanagh found himself enjoying the confidence of this girl so strangely thrown into his care, and the curious comment of the people in the street did not disturb him except as it bore upon his companion's position in the town.

At the door of the hotel some half a dozen men were clustered. As the young couple approached they gave way, but a short, powerful man, whom Lee Virginia recognized as Gregg, the sheepman, called to the ranger:

"I want to see you before you leave town, Mr. Ranger."

"Very well. I shall be here all the forenoon," answered Cavanagh in the tone of a man accepting a challenge. Then, turning to the girl, he said earnestly: "I want to help you. I shall be here for lunch, and meanwhile I wish you would take to-field into your confidence. He's a wise old boy, and everybody knows him. No one doubts his motives. Besides, he has a family and is rich and industrious. Would you like to talk with him?"

"If you will, I want to do right, indeed, I do."

"I'm sure of that," he said, with eyes upon her dusky and quivering face. "There's a way out, believe me."

Every word the woman uttered, every tone of her drawing voice, put Lee Virginia back into the past. She heard again the swift gallop of hoofs, saw once more the long line of armed ranchers and felt the hush of fear that lay over the little town on that fateful day. The situation became clearer in her mind. She recalled vividly the words of astonishment and hate with which the women had greeted her mother on the morning when the news came that Edward Wetherford was among the invading cattle barons—was indeed one of the leaders.

In Philadelphia the Rocky mountain states were synonyms of picturesque lawlessness, the theater of reckless Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary, (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reinforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonymy, pronunciation, have received unsurpassed scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. In size of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

They were rich, and the daughter was taking lessons on coyness and social small talk.

"A penny for your thoughts," she archly remarked to an abstracted visitor and then fell from the look of horror that overspread her parent's face, she must have been guilty of a false step.

"Why didn't you offer him a sovereign?" was the mother's criticism after the visitor's departure. "We've got money, and you must not be afraid to let folks know it."—London Scraps.

out on the Sulphur stage tomorrow. I'll pay your way back to Philadelphia."

"I can't leave you now, mother. Now that I know you're ill I'm going to stay and take care of you."

Lee rose. "See here, girl, don't you go to idealizing me neither. I'm what the boys call an old battleaxe. I've been through the whole war. I'm able to feed myself and pay your board besides. Just you find some decent boarding place in Sulphur, and I'll see that you have $10 a week to live on just because you're a Wetherford."

"But I'm your daughter!"

Again Eliza fixed a musing look upon her. "I reckon if the truth was known your Aunt Sella was higher to being your mother than I ever was. They always said you was all Wetherford, and I reckon they were right."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Visions of reforming methods about the house passed through the girl's mind. "There must be something I can do. Why don't you have the doctor come down here?"

"I might do that if I get any worse, but I hate to have you stay in the house another night. It's only fit for these goats of cowboys and women like Mrs. Jackson—I don't care till somebody like you or Reddy or Ross comes along."

"No, child; you get ready and suit

LEE WAS IN VIOLENT ALTERCATION WITH A WAITRESS

romance, and Virginia Wetherford, loyal daughter of the west, had defended it, but in the coarse phrase of this lean ranchman was pictured a land of border warfare as ruthless as that which marked the Scotland of Rob Roy.

Commonplace as the little town looked at the moment, it had been the scene of many a desperate encounter, as the girl herself could testify, for she had been more than one man killed therein.

Then her mind came back to her mother's illness. Eliza Wetherford had never been one to complain, and her groans meant real suffering.

Her mind resolved upon one thing. "She must see a doctor," she decided. And with this in mind she re-entered the enfeebled Eliza in violent altercation with a waitress.

"Mother," called Lee. "I want to see you."

With a parting volley of vituperation Mrs. Wetherford followed her daughter back into the lodging house.

"Mother," the girl began, facing her and speaking firmly, "you need help, and if the doctor here can't help you you must go to Sulphur or to Kansas City. I can run the boarding house until you get back."

Eliza eyed her curiously. "Don't you go to counting on this chivalry of the west which story writers put into books. These men out here will not let you up if you don't watch out. I wouldn't dare to leave you here alone. No; what I'll do is sell the place, if I can, and both of us get out."

"But you need a doctor this minute."

"I'll be all right in a little while; I'm always the worst for an hour or two after I eat. This little squirt of a local doctor gave me some dope to ease that pain, but I've got my doubts—I don't want any morphine habit in mine. No, daughter Virginia, it's mighty white of you to offer, but you don't know what you're up against when you contract to step into my shoes."

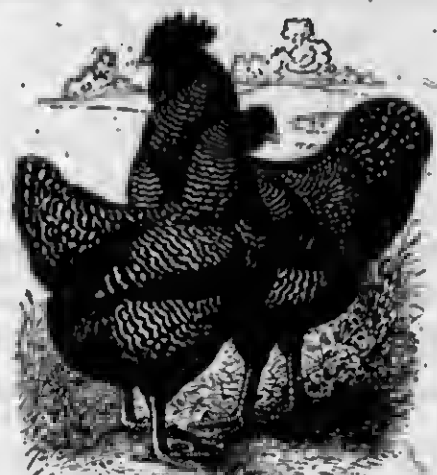

"Why, you remember the rustler war? We date everything out here from that year. You was here, for I saw you."

"Oh," exclaimed Virginia. "I understand now. Yes, I was here. I saw my father at the head of the cowboys."

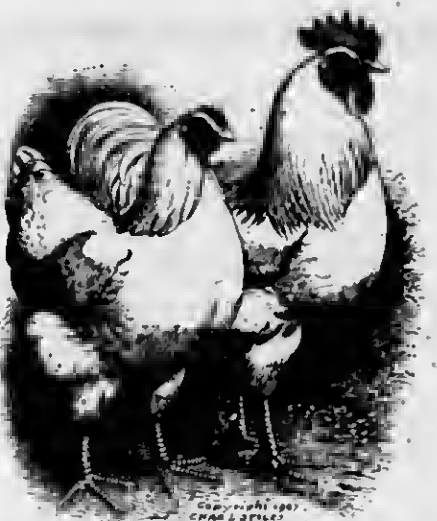

"They weren't cowboys. They were hired killers from Texas. That's what led you to go out of the state. He was on the wrong side, and if it hadn't been for the regular soldiers he'd a' been wiped out right here. As it was, he had to skip the range and hide."

"I don't know. I don't know folks will lay it up on you—being a girl—but they couldn't do son of Ed Wetherford come back here and settle, not for a minute. Why, were you has had to bluff the whole county a most—"

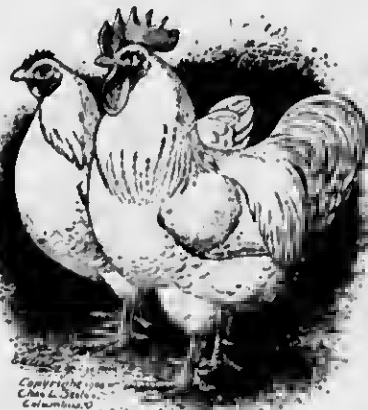

"I lay anything up on her. I tell folks she was that bewitched with Ed she couldn't see things any way but potatoes clean and carry the refuse out at the bottom. It peels a pack of potatoes perfectly in two minutes, and while the machine is still running a door in the side is opened and the potatoes are ejected by centrifugal force into a proper receptacle.

A motor of one-half horsepower capacity furnishes ample power, and the driving pulley is proportioned to give 600 revolutions per minute to the disk. It is claimed that the machine saves 20 per cent of potato which is wasted by hand peeling, to say nothing of the saving in labor and time. Deep eyes and corners in irregular potatoes must, of course, be removed with a knife.

Put One Over on A Georgia Farmer.

Mean Trick to Which a Rural Legislator Was Subjected.

Hoke Smith of Georgia believes his state crowns all others in its sense of civic and political honesty, and he tells this story to prove it:

A wealthy farmer named Sneads, who, though he could neither read nor write, was elected to the Georgia legislature, was a power in politics because of his sterling honesty. When he arrived at Atlanta he was invited to luncheon at a well-hotel by another member of the legislature. Sneads' host nonchalantly passed him the bill of fare. Sneads held it before him as if studying it intently. "Well, how does that bill look to you?" asked the host, unaware of his guest's inability to read. "Well, it may be all right," replied Sneads, slipping it down on the table, "but you don't catch me votin' for it till I know more about it!"

Preferred No Other Side.

Robert Louis Stevenson and Edmund Gosse were promiscuous in Edinburgh one afternoon when they met a stalwart beggar, whom Gosse refused to aid. Stevenson, however, wavered and finally handed him a sixpence. The man pocketed the coin, forbore to thank his benefactor, but, fixing his eyes on Gosse, said in a loud voice:

"And what is the other little gentleman going to give me?"

"In future," said Stevenson as they strode coldly on, "I shall be the other little gentleman!"—London News.

An Awkward Interviewer.

One of the raw reporters visiting Frank Hedley of the New York subway asked him an indiscreet question. Mr. Hedley merely smiled and said, "If your city editor was to send you to get a story about a baby of distinguished parentage I know perfectly well what question you would ask the baby's mother."

"Oh, you do, do you?" said the raw reporter. "What would it be?"

"You would ask the church over critically and then ask the mother, 'Isn't it a little cross-eyed?'"

Thomas and Will Tracy, he visited the old beer garden at the brewery on Saturday with a search and seizure warrant and found a quantity of liquor in bottles, packed in barrels, which was confiscated. Anderson was arraigned before Justice Krieger and was bound over to the circuit court for trial under bond of $500.—Petoskey Record.

At this convention the following candidates will be nominated: Two Justices of the Supreme Court. Two Regents of the University. Superintendent of Public Instruction. Member State Board of Education. Two Members State Board of Agriculture. All the present officials will probably be re-nominated. At this election also, there will be elected Circuit Judges in all the judicial circuits of Michigan. They will be nominated at the primary to be held March 1. In this circuit E. N. Clink of East Jordan is an active candidate for the Republican nomination and is receiving strong assurances of support. He nominated he would make a strong candidate. Petitions are also being circulated asking for the nomination of the present judge, F. W. Mayne, who has filled the position two terms. If any of the other parties have candidates in the field, we haven't heard of them yet. In the county, County Commissioner of Schools is the only county official to be elected. He may be opposed by Miss Stanford of East Jordan, who is highly recommended.

ELKINS OWED BANDIT

SENATOR STEPHEN B. ELKINS of West Virginia, who died recently, has had his fame as a great railroad pioneer and as secretary of war in the cabinet of President Harrison obscured in the popular mind by the rumors about the engagement of his daughter to the Duke of the Abruzzi. He was born in Perry county, O., on Sept. 26, 1811. His father was a farmer and moved while he was still a boy to Missouri. He was graduated from the university of that state in 1830 and took up the study of law.

Just as he was admitted to the bar the civil war started, and Mr. Elkins showed his individuality by breaking away from his family and all his home ties to enlist in the Union army. His father and brother fought for the Confederates, but he joined the Missouri militia and served long enough to gain the rank of captain.

Soon after he joined he met with an adventure which nearly cost him his life. With his brother he had left the Union lines to visit a woman friend of the family, and as he was returning he ran into a picket of Quantrill's guerrillas. They were noted for their brutality and were known to shoot all their prisoners.

Saved by Cole Younger.

Mr. Elkins was taken to the guerrilla camp and there fortunately recognized Cole Younger, an old friend and pupil of his. Younger interceded with Quantrill for the future senator and obtained a respite. As the guerrillas moved off Mr. Elkins had to ride with them, but as he reached the crossroads galloped off for his life. Younger held his captors in check, and he escaped. Younger, after the war, became a bandit and was a member of the Jesse James gang. He was sentenced to imprisonment for life, and years after Senator Elkins not only helped to secure his release, but received him at his own home when he was a free man.

Before the war was over Mr. Elkins left the army and in 1864 struck across the plains to New Mexico, to a border territory of which two-thirds of the population were Spanish. He acquired that language in the course of a year and soon secured a large law practice. He was elected to the legislature and also served as territorial attorney general. President Johnson made him territorial United States district attorney, and he was one of the few New Mexico officials whom General Grant did not dismiss.

It fell to his lot as a federal official to enforce the act of congress prohibiting slavery. At that time there were in New Mexico thousands of persons, who to all intents and purposes were enslaved by the Mexican residents. The abuse had been tolerated so long that it had become a regular social custom, but Mr. Elkins, in the face of vigorous opposition, insisted on the restoration of these unfortunates to freedom.

But besides enforcing the law he was amassing a fortune. His law practice was lucrative, and he had little competition. In particular he was associated with the Maxwell land grant, which, through his loyal services, received the confirmation of the courts.

Re-elected Despite Declination.

Mr. Elkins first appeared in Washington as the delegate to congress from the territory of New Mexico in 1873. His popularity among the Spanish secured him the handsome major.

HORNED MAN-MONKEYS FOUND

Skeletons of Queer Shape Exhumed in California.

What are described as skeletons of a strange tribe of horned man-monkey pygmies are being exhumed from an ancient burying ground discovered near Jackrabbits Lodge, in the delta of Topanga canyon, near Santa Monica, Cal. Forty-four skulls and almost as many complete sets of torso and limb bones have been recovered, together with strange antiquities apparently used by the tribe as weapons and many stone mortars.

The tribe is thought to have been the last of the kind, and it is asserted by a legend of the oldest Spanish families that Aztec Indians exterminated them upon their invasion into southern California.

RAISING FISH ON FARMS.

Novel Scheme to Reduce High Cost of Living.

State Fish and Game Warden George A. Lincoln has advised Iowa people to go into the business of raising fish for food in view of the high cost of living. "Food fishes," he says, "can be raised with no more difficulty than chickens or vegetables. A pond of an acre or more in extent and with eight or ten feet of water in the deepest part will, if properly managed, give excellent results."

The game warden has written instructions for the small fish farmer, who cannot afford a pond more than a quarter acre big and declares that the business is a good one in which to engage.

LIFE TO COLE YOUNGER

ity of 4,000, and he was re-elected for a second term while he was on a tour in Europe in the face of his own positive refusal of the nomination. He felt that he could not decline such an honor, and he acquired in his second term a national reputation by a speech in which he pleaded for the admission of the territory to statehood.

While in congress Mr. Elkins married a daughter of ex-Senator Henry Gasaway Davis of West Virginia. This alliance made him acquainted with great undeveloped resources of that mountainous state, and it decided him to throw in his lot with it.

Began Acquiring a Fortune.

After the expiration of his second congressional term, although he was always recognized as one of the leaders of the Republicans and was a member of the national committee, he severed his connection with New Mexico and lived for two years in Washington. He found that as a westerner of national reputation he could make money by looking after the legal business of the great interests which were growing up in the newly developed states.

Next he became interested in railroads and turned his attention more and more to the development of his wife's state in co-operation with her father. Together they conceived the West Virginia Central, which winds in and out of the Allegheny mountains. It threads the Cumberland region and taps a district enormously wealthy in coal and lumber.

Owning as he did in West Virginia hundreds of thousands of acres of timberland and thousands of acres of mines, Mr. Elkins became the uncrowned king of the state. He divided his power with his father-in-law, but in all their interests they were united. He came back into politics again with the nomination of James G. Blaine at Chicago in 1884.

It has always been supposed that the Maine statesman owed his nomination to the railroad man from West Virginia, and four years later Mr. Elkins again tried to make him the Republican standard bearer. Mr. Blaine refused, but it was only after he had embarked positively from Florence, Italy, that Mr. Elkins ceased to press his claims.

In Harrison's Cabinet.

He is then credited with having had much to do with the nomination of Harrison and in 1891 was invited by that president to join his cabinet as secretary of the war department. He held office for two years and was the inventor of the term "post exchanges," the word in use in the British army, as saving too much of drinking, and the word "exchange" seemed to him to be the exact title for the soldiers' club at an army post.

Already offered the complimentary nomination of the Republicans of West Virginia to the senate in 1891, Mr. Elkins was elected in 1895 and served continuously to his death. He had of late been identified with such men as Aldrich, but it was the force of circumstances rather than inclination which led him to take so strong a stand.

Curiously enough, while he represented West Virginia in the senate in the Republican interest, his father-in-law, ex-Senator Davis, was nominated as vice president on the Parker ticket. This was, however, understood at the time to be part of an arrangement between the senator and the Democratic leaders and in no way disturbed the peace of his family.

REAL HAIR GROWER FOUND.

But You Must Seek Frigid Professions, Preferably Polar.

The latest "universal" hair grower discovered is a trip to the Arctic regions or, failing time and inclination for that, employment in a cold storage company.

According to Sir Ernest Shackleton, the antarctic explorer, extreme cold is one of the best means of strengthening the hair. In the course of an interview recently Sir Ernest said:

"All of the men who went with me on the south pole expedition with one or two exceptions possessed stronger crops of hair on their return to civilization."

"Extreme cold undoubtedly strengthens one's hair." As our party approached near the south pole our hair grew more slowly, but became thicker and stronger."

An official of a London cold storage company, interviewed on the same subject, stated that there was not a bald-headed man in the employ of the company. He said that the men worked all day in a temperature of 20 degrees of frost, and the cold undoubtedly made their hair thicker.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

I have read with deep interest the article in The Ladies' Home Journal, entitled, "Why Prohibition has not Remedied the Lignor Evil." I will not just now, review the entire article, but as one whose home always has been in Maine, and one who for thirty-five years has been a careful student of the temperance question, not only in Maine but in every state in the Union, I have ample testimony to prove that, from a temperance standpoint, the prohibitory law is the best and most efficient law ever enacted to apply to the liquor traffic. The fact that liquor makers, liquor sellers and their emissaries thunder against prohibition, spending millions of money to defeat and overthrow it, furnishes complete evidence that prohibition prohibits. We have never claimed that it annihilates, for no law annihilates the evil against which it is aimed.

Referring to that section of the article in The Ladies' Home Journal sub-headed, "The Case in Maine," I beg to say that it does not rightly represent the case. The statement by Holman Day concerning the situation in Maine, as reported in this article, are not in keeping with the facts. It is not true to-day nor has it been true for fifty years, that "every hotel in Maine has practically an open bar." Some of the largest and most prosperous hotels in Maine never have attempted to sell liquor contrary to the law, and certainly have not maintained open bars.

The story relating to Governor Cobb is also misleading, and, in some particulars, entirely untrue. I have proof that Governor Cobb never made the remarks to Mr. Day which, in this article, are attributed to him. In Maine we well understand that Mr. Day is a writer of romance. Quite in contrast to the statement credited to him in The Ladies' Home Journal is the one he made in Appleton's, in August, 1908 under the title "Does Prohibition Pay?" Near the close of this article, after discussing the pros and cons of Maine prohibition, he said, "I am glad, with thousands of my Maine neighbors, that there are no saloons in Maine."

ANOTHER VICTORY FOR MICHIGAN

Was Won at the Chicago Land Exposition Last Fall

SECRETARY GIBSON TELLS THE STORY

Michigan Day Eclipsed All Others in Attendance

Over Fifteen Thousand Michigan Apples Were Given Away—Work of Boosting Will be Continued All the Time.

The Western Michigan Development Bureau has won another victory for the Wolverine State. This Bureau is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, not for pecuniary profit. Its aims and objects, as set forth in its articles of association and by-laws are the furtherance of the agricultural, horticultural, industrial and general interests of a fertile region which is rapidly coming to its own. This region is made up of the following twenty counties in the lower peninsula: Antrim, Benzie, Charlevoix, Emmet, Grand Traverse, Kalkaska, Kent, Lake, Leelanau, Manistee, Mecosta, Missaukee, Montcalm, Muskegon, Newaygo, Oshtemo, Oseola, Ottawa and Wexford.

The first attempt by the bureau to exploit the advantage of western Michigan on an extensive scale, was made at the Land and Irrigation Exposition, held at Chicago, in November, 1909, where an exhibit of fruit, seeds and grains was made. Although this exhibit was gotten together hurriedly, yet it was the center of attraction at the land show.

At the second Land and Irrigation Exposition at Chicago, Western Michigan was again on hand, winning fresh laurels and attracting a great deal of attention, with an exhibit consisting of thirty-seven varieties of apples, pears, apricots, quinces, crab apples, cranberries, potatoes, celery, grains, vegetables and a large and varied assortment of fruit in glass jars.

While many persons predicted that owing to the fact that this was an off year for fruit, it would not be possible for the bureau to put up as creditable an exhibit as last year, yet by careful planning and the employment of a competent man to select the fruit from all over its territory, a larger and better exhibit than that of 1909 was the result. This was admitted by the general public, and also by very many competent judges whose opinion is worth while.

Several of these men said that the Western Michigan exhibit was the best and most complete at the land show, and that to pay a visit to it was a liberal education to anyone at all interested in fruit or fruit growing.

The Western Michigan exhibit was a strictly commercial one. The fruit was packed in the regular bushel boxes, just as it came from the trees and with no embellishments, other than those provided by nature. The public were invited into the booth, where they were allowed to handle and taste the apples. No visitor to the land show who had the use of his olfactory nerves could help smelling the Michigan fruit, because the aroma from it pervaded the entire north half of the Coliseum. Many persons remarked that one had only to shut his eyes and follow his nose in order to find the western Michigan exhibit.

Charlevoix County Corn.

George Durand in his cabbage patch, Charlevoix Township, Charlevoix County.

The north entrance to the Western Michigan booth had a sign "Michigan" over it, made of wire letters filled with red apples. Two beautiful bay trees were placed on either side of this entrance. The south end of the booth was boarded up and had on the outside a painting of a Western Michigan farm scene showing the house, barn and grounds, and hung on the inside was an oil painting which attracted as much attention and created as much comment as any other one thing at the land show. This painting was 12x25 feet and occupied the entire south end of the booth. It was pronounced by competent authorities to be a work of art, and it helped the western Michigan boosters greatly in their work of showing up convincingly the many advantages which this land of opportunity affords.

This map or panel was, in the form of a proscenium, on the pillars of which the name of the 20 counties in the bureau appeared.

H. L. Olney's Potato Field, South Arm Township, Charlevoix County.

The transportation lines, both rail and water, were shown, making it easy to demonstrate the proximity of the territory to the big markets of the country and the low freight rates which prevail. The nearness of Lake Michigan and its many arms running far inland was shown, thus enabling the Michigan men to illustrate forcibly the beneficial effects which this closeness to the water has on the climate. By means of this map the resort feature of western Michigan were well illustrated and the fact emphasized that this region, with its woods, lakes, rivers and streams, is fast becoming the playgrounds of the middle west.

The western Michigan exhibit was more complete than any other, because not only was the raw fruit on exhibition, but the Hart Canning Co., in a very handsome booth which was a part of the Michigan exhibit carried on a demonstration of the same fruit in canned form, allowing every one who cared for it a free sample. Thousands of people tasted the canned fruit and were enthusiastic in its praises. Some one remarked that western Michigan showed everything except the soil.

Michigan Day was celebrated on November 25, and for enthusiasm and in point of numbers it far eclipsed any of the other state days observed at the land show. Twenty thousand six hundred seventy-three persons passed the turnstile on Michigan Day.

A program was arranged by the secretary of the Western Michigan Development Bureau which covered the entire day. It began with a lunch at the Union League Club, tendered by the managers of the land show. From 2 to 5 o'clock the program was carried out in the large hall, which holds 800 people. The thing that attracted the most attention was the singing of "Michigan My Michigan" by thousands of loyal Michiganers, accompanied by the band, on a given signal, promptly at 2 o'clock. Three thousand printed slips with the words of the song were distributed, so that everybody could sing who wanted to, and judging by the volume of sound it was evident that everybody sang.

On the afternoon and evening of Michigan Day about 15,000 big red western Michigan apples were given away, so that nearly every visitor to the show got a taste of the fruit, with the smell and the flavor. This proved to be a very and part of Illinois. The booklets will also be used in connection with the correspondence from the office of the bureau. A copy will be sent free to any one applying for it.

Those in charge of the exhibit at the land show know that the results will be far-reaching and will tell mightily in the development of western Michigan. Not only did the exhibit itself make a good impression on those who saw it, but the many questions which were corrected, and the heart-to-heart talk which were had with hundreds of interested people will bear fruit a hundred fold. It was very noticeable how earnestly so many people asked for reading matter on western Michigan, and with what care it was preserved. Seldom or never were any of the western Michigan booklets found on the floor of the Coliseum, which was littered with printed matter every morning.

E. H. CLARK PRESIDENT

Of the Charlevoix County Fruit Growers' Association

Next Meeting Will be Held in Charlevoix Friday.

Although the attendance at the Fruit Growers' meeting called at Boyce City on February 1, was small it was deemed wise by those in attendance to elect officers and to make another effort to effect a permanent organization of the fruit growers of the county.

E. H. Clark of Keweenaw was elected president, J. H. Milford secretary and M. H. Ruhling treasurer, together with three vice presidents and nine directors whose names will be published with the report of the next meeting.

Mr. Clark has called another meeting to be held in Charlevoix on Friday, February 10, 1911, at 1:30 o'clock p. m. sharp.

Such an organization as this will certainly be very valuable to the fruit growers and farmers of the county.

Such an organization can always get better prices on nursery stock, spraying materials, shippers' supplies, fertilizers and in fact, nearly any article that they use in connection with the fruit or farming business than the individual grower can get and no farmer or fruit grower in the county can afford to be out of the association.

We hope to see a large crowd present at the meeting in Charlevoix on Friday.

MANY CHANGES IN GAME LAWS

Proposed by State Game and Forest Warden Pierce

WILL COME BEFORE LEGISLATURE

In Bill Introduced by Representative Emerson

All Open Seasons to be Uniform—Limited to One Deer Only All Hunters to be Licensed.

Considerable amendments to the game laws of the state are proposed, and State Game and Forest Warden Charles S. Pierce held a conference with several members of the house and senate to get clear views on the needed legislation. It is likely the new game law bill will be introduced in the house by Representative Emerson. Among the changes proposed are the following:

Extending the season in which deer may be killed fifteen days, the season to open October 15 and close November 30.

Limit the number of deer that may be legally killed by a single hunter to one. It is argued that if a hunter could shoot but one deer, and had a longer time in which to do it, there would be fewer persons in the woods at one time. This it is believed would lessen the number of hunting accidents.

Make all open seasons for all kinds of wild game uniform. This would make the season the same as the deer season, and would cut out the spring shooting of ducks.

It is argued the birds need fully as much protection as the deer, now it is proposed to permit the shooting of them from October 15 to November 30, coincident with the deer season and at no other time.

Limit the number of partridge that may be had in possession at one time to ten, or perhaps fifteen, at the outside. It is believed, that such an act would make it unprofitable for the hunter to make trips down from the woods every week or so to dispose of his bag and then go back to kill more as now.

Permit the killing of quail only under strict provisions.

Provide a hunter's license, making every man who shoots deer or birds pay to the state for the expenses of the game warden's department, a license fee of $1.00.

VICTORY FOR CHARLEVOIX

Basket Ball Team Defeated Petoskey Wednesday Night.

The second home game of the local basket ball season resulted in a victory for the home team by a score of 35 to 19. The game was fast throughout, and showed that the local team is capable of competing with any team in this vicinity. The score at the end of the first half stood 7 to 5 in favor of Petoskey but by some accurate basket work of J. Powers this lead was quickly over come. Petoskey sent over a very fast bunch, which with practice will make an excellent team.

The locals play Harbor Springs here to-night and a close score is predicted. The local team plays Mancelona at Mancelona Friday.

The line up was as follows:

R. E. N. Meyer, L. P. A. Jacobs, C. J. Powers, R. G. H. Wallace, L. G. L. Crant.

The Great Conservation Novel

CHAPTER IV.
THE NEW WEST AND THE OLD.
THE knowledge that she must spend another night in the land Lee Virginia to active measures of reform. She hurried from one needed reform to another. She drew others into the vortex.

She organized the giggling waiters into a warring party and advanced upon the flies. By hissing and shooting and the flutter of newspapers they drove the enemy before them, and a carpenter was called in to mend screen doors and windows, thus preventing their return. New shades were hung to darken the room and new tablecloths purchased to replace the old ones, and the whole place had such a cleaning as it had not known before in five years.

In this work the time passed swiftly, and when Redfield and Cavanagh came again to lunch they exclaimed in astonishment, as, indeed, every one did. "How's this?" queried Cavanagh humorously. "Has the place changed hands?"

Lize was but grudgingly responsive. "Seems like it has."

"I hope the price has not gone up."

"Not yet."

Redfield asked, "Who's responsible for this—your new daughter?"

"You've hit it. She's started right in to push us all up to city standards. She can run the whole place out if she's a mind to, even if I go broke for it. The work she got out of them girls is a wonder."

Lee Virginia came in flushed and self-conscious, but far lighter of spirit than at breakfast, and stood beside the table while the waitress laid the dishes before her guests with elaborate assumption of grace and design. Hitherto she had hunched them down with a slash of slangy comment. The change was quite as wonderful as the absence of the flies.

"Do we owe these happy reforms to you?" asked Cavanagh, admiring Virginia's neat dress and glowing cheeks.

"Partly," she answered. "I was desperate. I had to do something, so I took to ordering people around."

"I understand," he said. "Won't you sit at our table again?"

"Please do," said Redfield. "I want to talk with you."

She took a seat a little hesitatingly. "You see, I studied domestic science at school, and I've never had a chance to apply it before."

"Here's your opportunity," Redfield assured her. "My respect for the science of domesticity is growing. I marvel to think what another week will bring forth. I think I'll have to come down again just to observe the improvement in the place."

"It can't last," Lize interjected. "She'll catch the western habits. She'll sag, same as we all do."

"No, she won't," declared Ross, with intent to encourage her. "If you give her a free hand I predict she'll make your place the wonder and boast of the county-side."

"When do you go back to the mountains?" Lee Virginia asked a little later.

"Immediately after my luncheon," he replied.

She experienced a pang of regret and could not help showing it a little. "Your talk helped me," she said. "I've decided to stay and be of use to my mother."

Redfield overheard this and turned toward her.

"I want Mrs. Redfield to know you. I'm sure her advice will be helpful. I hope you'll come up and see us if you decide to settle in Sulphur or if you don't."

"I should like to do so," she said, touched by the tone as well as by the words of his invitation.

"Redfield's house is one of the few completely civilized homes in the state," put in Cavanagh. "When I get so weary of cuss words and poaching and graft that I can't live without killing some one I go down to Elk Lodge and smoke and read the supervisor's Lodon and Paris weeklies and recover my tone."

Redfield smiled. "When I get weak-kneed or careless to the service and feel my self respect slipping away I go up to Ross' cabin and talk with a man who represents the impersonal, even handed justice of the federal law."

Cavanagh laughed. "There! Having handed each other reciprocal bouquets, we can now tell Miss Wetherford the truth. Each of us thinks very well of himself, and we're both believers in the new west."

"What do you mean by the new west?" asked the girl.

"Well, the work you've been doing here this morning is part of it," answered Redfield. "It's a kind of housecleaning. The old west was picturesque and in a way manly and fine—certain phases of it were heroic—and I hate to see it all pass, but some of us began to realize that it was not all poetry. The plain truth is my companions for over twenty years were lawless ruffians, and the cattle business as we practiced it in those days was founded on selfishness and the fend at the mouth of the pistol. We were all pensioners on Uncle Sam and fighting to keep the other fellow off from having a share of his bounty. It was all wasteful, half savage. We didn't want settlement; we didn't want law; we didn't want a state. We wanted free range. We were a line of pirates from beginning to end, and we're not wholly reformed yet."

Some one at the table accused Redfield of being more of a town site booster than a cattlemen.

He was quite annoyed by this charge. "The town site booster at least believes in progress. He does not go so far as to shut out settlement. I don't care to have my children live the life I've lived. Besides, what right have we to stand in the way of a community's growth? Suppose the new life is less picturesque than the old. We don't like to leave behind us the pleasures and sports of boyhood, but we grow up nevertheless. I'm far more loyal to the state as forest supervisor than I was when I was riding with the cattlemen to scare up the neater."

At this moment Sam Gregg entered the room, followed by a young man in an English riding suit. Seeing that the star boarder table offered a couple of seats, they pointed that way. Sam was plainly in a wretched frame of mind and slumped his shoulders on its rail with the action of a man heating an adversary.

"That is Sam Gregg and his son Joe. Used to be ranch cattlemen, now one of our biggest sheepmen," Cavanagh explained. "He's hucking the cattlemen now."

Lee Virginia studied young Gregg with interest, for his dress was that of a man to whom money came easy, and his face was handsome, though rather fat and sulky. In truth, he had been brought into the room by his father to see "Lize Wetherford's girl," and his eyes at once sought and found her. A look of surprise and pleasure at once lit his face.

Gregg was the greedy west checked and restrained by the law. Every man in the room knew that he was a bitter opponent of the forest service and that he "had it in" for the ranger, and some of them knew that he was throwing more sheep into the forest than his permits allowed and that a clash with Redfield was sure to come. It was just like the hurly old Irishman to go straight to the table where his adversary sat.

Virginia's eyes fell before the gaze of these two men, for they had none of the shy reserve of the girl's father. The ruler men she had met in Redfield did not soften his words on Gregg's account. On the contrary, he made them still more cutting and to the line.

"The mere fact that I live near the open range or a national forest does not give me any rights in the range or forest," he was saying as Gregg took his seat. "I enjoy the privilege of these government grazing grounds, and I ought to be perfectly willing to pay the fee. These forests are the property of the whole nation. They are public lands and should yield a revenue to the whole nation. It is silly to expect the government to go on enriching a few of us stockmen at the expense of others. I see this, and I accept the charge."

"After you've got rib at it," said Gregg.

"Well, haven't you?" retorted Redfield. "Are you so greedy that nothing will stop you?"

Gregg growled out: "I'm not letting any of my rights slip. I'll have your head, Mr. Supervisor. I'll carry my light to the secretary."

"Very well," returned Redfield, "carry it to the president if you wish. I simply repeat that your sheep must correspond to your permit, and if you don't send up and remove the extra number I will do it myself. I don't make the rules of the department. My job is to carry them out."

By this time every person in the room was tense with interest. They all knew Gregg and his imperious methods. Some of the cattlemen in the room had suffered from his crowd, and while they were not partisans of the supervisor, they were glad to see him face his opponent fearlessly.

Lize delivered a parting blow: "Hill-frog, you and me are old friends. We're on the losing side. We belong to the 'good old days' when the Fork was a 'man's town' and to be 'shot up' once a week kept us in news. But then times are past. You can't run the range that way any more. Why, man, you'll have to buy and fence your own pasture in a few years more or else pay rent same as I do. You stockmen kick like steers over paying a few old cents a head for five months' range; you'll be mighty glad to pay a dollar one of these days. Take your medicine—that's my advice. And she went back to her cash drawer."

Redfield's voice was cuttingly contemptuous as he said quite calmly: "You're all kinds of asses, you sheepmen. You ought to pay the fee for your cattle with secret joy. So long as you can get your stock pastured (and in effect guarded) by the government from June to November for 20 cents or even 50 cents per head you're in luck. Mrs. Wetherford is right. We've all been educated in a herd school. Uncle Sam has been too lazy to keep any supervision over his public lands. He's permitted his grass pirates to fight and lynch and turn out another on the high range to which neither of us had any claim, holding back the real user of the land the farmer."

Gregg was silenced, but not convinced. "It's a long time that has run," he burst out. "You think you're the whole United States army? Who gives you all the authority?"

"Congress and the president."

"There's nothing in that till to warrant these petty tyrannies of yours."

"But you call tyrannies. I call defending the public domain," replied Redfield. "If I had my way I'd give my rangers the power of the Canadian mounted police. Is there any other state in this nation where the roping of sheep herders and the wholesale butchery of sheep would be permitted? From the very first the public lands of this state have been a refuge for the criminal, a lawless man's land, but now, thanks to Roosevelt and the rifle forester, we at least have a force of men on the spot to see that some semblance of law and order is maintained. You follow many protest and run to Washington, and you may send your paid representatives there, but you're sure to lose. As free range monopolists you are enemies of the earth, and all you represent must pass before this state can be anything but the hy-wild it now is."

The whole dining room was still as he finished, and Lee Virginia, with a girl's vague comprehension of the man's words, apprehended in Redfield's speech a large and daring purpose.

Gregg sneered. "Perhaps you intend to run for congress on that line of talk."

Redfield's voice was placid. "At any rate, I intend to represent the policy that will change this state from the sparsely settled battleground of a lot of mounted hoboes to a state with an honorable place among the other commonwealths. If this he reason make the most of it."

Cavanagh was disturbed, for, while he felt the truth of his chief's words, he was in doubt as to the policy of interfering them. He rose. "I must be going," he said, with a smile.

Again the pang of loss touched her heart. "When will you come again?" she asked in a low voice.

"It is hard to say. A ranger's place is in the forest. I am very seldom in town. Just now the danger of fires is great, and I am very uneasy. I may not be down again for a month."

The table was empty now, and they were standing in comparative isolation, looking into each other's eyes in silence. At last she murmured: "You've helped me. I'm going to stay a little while anyway and do what I can."

"I'm sorry I can't be of actual service, but I am a soldier with no work to do. Even if I were here I could not help you as regards the townspeople. They all hate me quite cordially, but Redfield, and especially Mrs. Redfield, can be of greater aid and comfort. He's quite often here, and when you are lonely and discouraged let him take you up to Elk Lodge."

He extended his hand, and as she took it he thrilled to the soft strength of it. "Till next time," he said, "good luck."

CHAPTER V.

VIRGINIA TAKES ANOTHER MOTOR RIDE.

LEE VIRGINIA'S efforts to reform the little hotel produced an amazing change in Eliza Wetherford's affairs. The dining room swarmed with those seeking food, and as the news of the girl's hearty went out upon the range the cowboys sought excuse to ride in and get a square meal and a glimpse of the "queen" whose hand had wrenched the old shack into a marvel of cleanliness. Generally they failed of so much as a glance at her, for she kept away from the dining room at mealtime.

Lee Virginia was fully aware of this male curiosity and vaguely conscious of the light which shone in the eyes of some of them (men like Gregg). She had begun to understand, too, that her mother's reputation was a barrier between the better class of folk and herself. But as they came now and again to take a meal they permitted themselves a word in her praise, which she resented. "I don't want your friendship now," she declared bitterly.

As she gained courage to look about her she began to be interested in some of her boarders.

So far as the younger men were concerned, she saw little to admire and much to hate. They were crude and uninteresting, rowdies for the most part. She was put upon her defense by their glances, and she came to dread walking along the street, so open and coarse were their words of praise.

Few of these loafers had the courage to stand on their feet and court her favor, but there was one who speedily became her chief persecutor. This was Nell Ballard, celebrated (and made impudent) by two years' travel with a wild west show. He was tall, lean, angular and freckled, but his horse-manship was marvelous and his skill with the rope magical.

He had lost his engagement by reason of a drunken brawl, and he was now living with his sister, the wife of a small rancher near by. Virginia despised the other men, but she feared this one, and quite justly.

The Greggs, father and son, were in open rivalry for Lize also, but in different ways. The older man, who had already been married several times, was disposed to buy her hand in what he called "honorable wedlock," but the son, at heart a libertine, approached her as one who despised the west, and who, being kept in the beastly country by duty to a parent, was really to amuse himself at any one's expense. He had no purpose in life, but to feed his body and escape toil.

The rivalry of the plains, of which Lize had read so much and which she supposed she remembered, was gone. She doubted if it had ever existed among these cannibals. Why should it inhere in ignorant, brutal plainsmen any more than in ignorant, brutal factory hands?

There came to her now and again gentle old ranchers—"grangers," they

POSTAGE STAMP MACHINE.

Works Automatically and Rejects All Bogus Coins.

Some months ago a Trinidad clergyman designed a postage stamp machine which has recently been improved in London and installed in a postoffice in that city.

By automatic action when a proper coin is placed in the slot and the handle pulled it separates a penny stamp from a roll inside the machine and securely fixes it upon the envelope held in an aperture of the machine. The machine is about the size of an ordinary typewriter and stamps envelopes, newspapers or circulars at the rate of 4,000 an hour with seemingly absolute accuracy. The machine will hold 50,000 stamps, and as used each stamp is automatically registered.

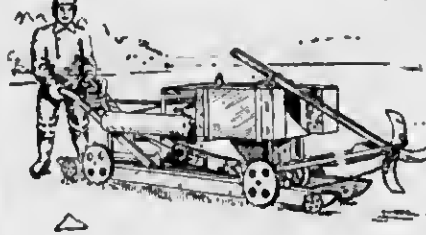

The coin to be received by this piece of mechanism must be genuine, of perfect size and shape. It is claimed that it will return the silver piece inserted in the slot by error, but keeps without any recompense the fraudulent metal disk. It is reported that the machine is to be placed in every underground railway station and at all pillar boxes.

X Rays Cure Deafness.

Purely by accident it was discovered in London recently that certain forms of deafness can be cured by means of the X rays. A man who had been deaf all his life was treated by the rays for an ulcer on his tongue. The ulcer was cured, and he was surprised to find that his hearing had returned at the same time. He lived on a very noisy street, but had never noticed the noise. Gradually he found himself being waked up very early in the morning, and it was some time before he realized that it was because he was beginning to hear the sounds around him. Other cases of deafness have been treated by the same method with success. The belief of the doctors is that the rays stimulate the tiny nerves in the ear which have been denuded by disease or shock, so that they become sensitive again to sound waves.

Motor Ice Harvester.

The superintendent of a Boston ice company has brought the motor ice harvester herewith illustrated to a stage of development in which it has proved itself practical. It weighs but 650 pounds and is driven by an eight horse power engine. The four bladed cutter is geared to make 1,800 revolutions per minute, traveling 3,000 feet while the traction wheels, which engage with the ice and force, the machine along on its runners, make ten and a half revolutions per minute, in which time the machine travels fifty-two and a half feet—Popular Mechanics.

FARMERS! ATTENTION!

We wish to take this opportunity of correcting the statements made by some of the old line insurance companies regarding the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company of Charlevoix, Emmet and Cheboygan counties. We wish to say this company is not going to discontinue business, but on the other hand is doing more business than it has done in the five years past. The Mutual Company puts out a policy for farmers only. We ask each one to compare the two policies and satisfy yourself which gives you the best protection. We are here for the interest of the farmers, to protect the fire loss.

HARDENING SPRINGS.

Various Methods of Securing the Proper Temper.

The following methods will be found very good for hardening and tempering small springs for gun and novelty work and will apply equally well on roll springs or those that are flat or irregular, says Popular Mechanics. The first thing to be considered is the fire, which must be well burned down if the force is used. A gas or gasoline fire is the best for work of this kind. A blow torch will answer well for the smaller springs. The first method is to heat the spring evenly until it shows a light red, after which plunge it into a bath of lard oil or tallow. This hardens the spring, and by holding it over the fire, dripping from the bath, the oil takes fire and burns off, after which it is plunged in a bath of clear water. This will produce a good temper. A very good plan is to hang the small springs on a copper wire when dipping, as tongs will prevent the metal from hardening properly.

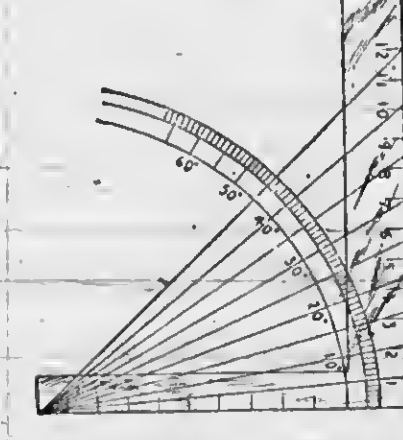

The second method is to heat the spring to a light red (in the shade) and plunge into warm water. This will give very good results and is quick and cheap. The third method is to heat the spring to a cherry red and plunge in a bath of lard. This will make the metal as hard as glass. Polish the spring and lay it on a flat piece of sheet iron. Then place it over the fire and as soon as the color draws to a light gray remove it from the fire and let all cool together. If the spring is too hard to be cut with a sharp file it is too hard for use and should be tempered over again. The fourth method is to heat the spring to a bright red and plunge into a bath of raw linseed oil and leave it until cool. The spring will have the proper temper without drawing.

Alloys of Magnesium.

Many unsuccessful experiments, states the Metal Industry, have been made in the hope of utilizing magnesium, as owing to its extreme lightness it would be most suitable if it could be alloyed with another metal so as to produce an alloy which combines strength with lightness, as there is a considerable field for one, not only in the construction of aeroplanes, but for many other branches of engineering where weight is a consideration. Magnesium has a specific gravity of 1.7, so that it is much lighter even than aluminum, whose specific gravity is 2.6, while that of iron is 7.8, so that magnesium is more than five times as light as iron and 50 per cent lighter than aluminum. A recent French patent describes a process of manufacturing alloys of magnesium and zinc containing as much as from 90 to 96 per cent magnesium. The same inventor claims to have succeeded in making a practically alloy of calcium, whose specific gravity is 1.55 and which is therefore even lighter than magnesium, with zinc, copper or aluminum or a mixture of these three metals.

To Find Angles on a Square.

While the forty-five and ninety degree angles are easily found by the carpenter, other angles between these two are not so easily obtained, says Popular Mechanics. If the short end of a common square is taken for a base the markings on the long blade, as illustrated, indicate the different angles by intervals of five degrees up to forty-five degrees.

The Elusive Vacuum.

The space above the mercury in a thermometer is not a perfect vacuum. There is not infrequently a small amount of air left in such space, and there is always an atmosphere of the vapor of mercury. It is perhaps impossible to procure a vacuum, says Harper's Weekly. It is most likely that even if a real vacuum could be obtained for an instant air or other vapor would at once begin to be disengaged from the sides of the vessel in which it was made, and it would thus instantly cease to exist. Such an airily has denied the possibility of a vacuum. If a vacuum could be effected the sides of the vessel would probably be pressed into contact.

Destroying Grasshoppers.

Consult John F. Jewell of Melbourne states that the only measure taken in the state of Victoria, Australia, to combat the ravages of grasshoppers is the sale by the government entomologist to farmers of a locust fungus prepared at the government laboratory from a secret formula. This fungus is sold at the rate of 1 shilling (21 cents) per tube of about one ounce and produces a contagious fungous growth among grasshoppers, from which they die.

Filling For Wall Cracks.

Instead of mixing plaster of paris in water to fill cracks in walls before painting, mix the dry plaster with the paint. Then the crack will not show as they do if filled with the plaster of paris.

CLOTHES AND THE MAN.

I'm going to sing you a fine little song,

'Tis all of a man of your town.

He carries a stock in the old Edgan block.

And his prices on goods are way down.

Then stick to the man the best you can.

That sells the goods at prices that are right.

Now don't take my word, or a thing you've heard.

But drop in upon him some day or night.

His name is Meyer Cohen, a lad you know well.

He's a jolly good fellow you can bet.

You'll find him as yore in the Palace Clothing Store.

And his best friends are all trading there yet.

His goods are the very best that money can buy.

The style and the quality is certainly great.

No matter what time of the year you call.

You are never too early or never too late.

The prices he asks will not take your breath.

He surely will please you if anyone could.

For live, and let live, is the motto that he has.

And 'tis the way he handles his goods.

A cranky old bat, once wanted a hat.

He had not smiled for a number of years.

When he heard the price, he said, that's alright.

And he laughed until he nearly shed tears.

If a man should tell you, not to trade with a Jew.

Just put him right down for a snob.

For you will get treated right, by day or by night.

For he's always right there and on the job.

He has plenty to see, he can fit to a "T."

The largest and the smallest in the town.

From his big stock of hats that lay upon the rack.

From the lowest up to the highest crown.

A man bought from the clerk a hat and shirt.

And his sweetheart soon said she would be true.

If clothes bought from a Jew, will make girls true.

You can not tell what Jew Clothing will do.

No Fool Like an Old Fool

And In Love Young People Are Not Overwise

By J. BERRY CRAPO.
Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

When I was fourteen years old my father one morning called me into his study and said to me:

"Frank, I have a letter from your Uncle Mark, in which he offers to take you to live with him and leave you all his property at his death. You know that, being a poor clergyman, I have nothing to leave you, and by going to your uncle you will eventually be rich."

"Do you advise me to accept the offer?" I asked my father.

"There is a certain important reason for my not wishing you to do so. Your uncle is a neophyte. I have had a love affair with him which has turned out badly and has convinced me that he is a bad man. He declares that he will never marry, and his spleen is so great that he wishes so far as possible to prevent any woman from enjoying his property. He therefore makes it a condition with you that you shall blind yourself never to marry."

Being too young to settle such an important matter for myself, my action was decided upon in a family conference or, rather, by my mother, who, being the last word of appeal in all matters pertaining to the household, decided that I should accept the offer. She gave no reasons in support of this decision, but it was supposed that she fancied my uncle might find a new love and his antagonism to women would vanish. In this case I would at least be educated by him.

When I went to live with my uncle he was forty years old. At that age a man, especially if soured by the miscarriage of a love affair, is not likely to fall into another one. Instead of softening toward the opposite sex his antipathy increased. His associations were not with young and pliant women, but with those of his own age. Something of his own crankiness in them drew sparks, as that striking hint. One by one his unmarried women friends fled away from him, he shut himself up in his house, receiving only his men friends there evenings for a rubber at whist.

Had my uncle desired to bring me up to break my contract he could not have placed me in a position better calculated to bring about such a result. An old housekeeper was the only woman in our home except the negro cook. We do not cover what we have, but what we are deprived of. I went to school with boys and never associated with girls. From the time I was fourteen till I was twenty I did not know what it was to have a girl friend. When I saw them on the street going to school I would turn to follow them admiringly with my eyes. One day when I was about sixteen, walking with my uncle, one of those little creatures whose skirts extend only to their ankles passed me. He observed me turn and look at her.

"You have remarked, I see," he said to me, "that innocent looking creature. She is very pretty to look upon. I admit, but under that grace and beauty is poison—poison of the most virulent kind. She will grow up to womanhood without a spark of that sense of honor which is born in us men and which I and your school-masters are endeavoring to stimulate in you."

"Nevertheless, Uncle Frank," I replied, "she's mighty pretty."

A deep sigh was his only response. This girl I used to meet every day as we were going to school. She must have seen admiration in my eye, for after awhile she would pass me with a very conscious look, casting her eyes in every direction except toward me, hitching her shoulders, brushing back a curl that hung on one of them or in some other way indicating that she was aware that a youngster of opposite sex was interested in her. In one of those meetings she was suddenly agitated to drop several of her books. I took them up and handed them to her, she availing looking at me as if I were an ogre, a glance at whose face would turn her to stone.

Not having any assurance and desiring to give her a flower, one morning upon meeting her I dropped it on the pavement shortly before we passed. I turned, intending to see her walk over it with her head turned contemptuously upward, and when I saw her stoop and pick it up my heart beat like a trip hammer. I considered that I had been a marvel of bravery. I wondered how I had dared do it.

What avail is it for the old to attempt to instill their ideas, their fears, their hopes—indeed, their varied experiences—into the young? It did not enter my head that this delicate creature would ever be nought but a thing of beauty and a joy forever. My uncle's prophecy had no more effect upon my heart than a drop of rain on my cheek. From the moment I saw her pick up the flower I had not the courage to hand her openly I was a changed man—boy. I grew bold as a lion. A few days later I went to school with a bunch of violets in my hand and on meeting her did not fear to toss them to her. She caught them, and the smile she gave me set my heart aflame.

And so I came to school with her work as readily as if I had carried my own. I was not attempting to thwart her, as unconcerned as the violets I tossed to the maiden with whom she designed I should fulfill her intentions. Of what importance to me were my uncle's warnings that this sweet creature was a temptress with poison in her bosom? And what troubled it that I had made a contract with him never to marry? Marry? What had my love to do with marriage? It was love—love absolutely pure—that had taken possession of me. Marriage was something to be considered when I should reach what to me was an advanced age. And the girl? Between her and that something which falls to the lot of older people was still the gift of some five or six years—an intermediate period.

But time was passing more rapidly even than one realized. Before we had had time to come to that comparatively prosaic period when young people begin to talk of the love they feel—an advanced stage on the road to commonplace matrimony—we were separated, I going to college, she to a seminary. However, there were four years before us of love dreaming. I have always thought that the period of feeling was so long in giving way to that of speech. There is in the former a delicious doubt, a fear that there will nothing come of it all, a dread that at any time we may hear that the loved one has entered into another such world far more beautiful than the first and leaving a horrible void for the forsaken one.

When we returned, an educated man and a woman, all was changed. The flower had opened, but there were a lot of thorns bristling about it. I knew that the result of love was marriage, and between me and marriage stood a fortune. Still I was no wise old man. I was merely one beginning life and endowed with the propensities bestowed upon mankind. I felt in honor bound since my uncle had brought me up for a certain purpose under certain conditions to fulfill those conditions. I was now old enough to realize the responsibilities I was under and that a carrying out of the contract with my uncle would involve the loss to me of my love. On one side of me was Sylvia, on the other Chaubids.

Though I was twenty-one I was no wiser in love than when I was sixteen, and my uncle, who was past fifty, was a greater fool as regards such matters than I. The truth is the farther we get from that period when nature intends we shall mate the less we know about mating. When we are in it we and it are the truth; when we pass beyond it we know it by cold experience only. The boys and girls to whom in other matters we may be solons, in matters of love can not what we cannot even feel.

This analytical statement is preliminary to a confession. The first thing I knew I was married clandestinely. The marrying occupied about three minutes, the ragged edge period that followed occupied months. Common sense should have told me to arrange the matter with my uncle first and marry afterward. But common sense is very sparing of visits to young people. It is supposed to be a natural faculty, but I am inclined to think it an artificial faculty. What does a pal of threes know about common sense?

After our clandestine marriage we lived in a perpetual whirl between alternate bliss and mental torture. At least I did. My wife, with the delightful stupidity of woman, said it would come out all right. Her prediction was followed by my uncle's suddenly falling dead of heart disease.

Here was a pretty kettle of fish! I was his heir under pledge of bachelorhood, and I was married. However, I was glad that the blow had fallen. I was tired of lying under false colors.

Then what happened? Why, when the will was read it was found that the bulk of his estate was left to me and under a condition. What condition? Why, that I marry before I could inherit a cent of his money. There was a codicil leaving the income of $50,000 to a Miss Arabella Wagstaff during her life. What did this mean? And who was Miss Wagstaff?

It came out at last that even old people can sometimes be natural in matters of love. Miss Wagstaff was the woman with whom my uncle had had trouble in his youth and who had turned him against her sex. Shortly before his death he discovered that some forty years before he had made an ass of himself and had treated a girl very badly. He made amends so far as he could by leaving her enough to make her comfortable for the rest of her life.

"Didn't I tell you it would come out all right?" remarked my wife, making one of those liberal, irrelative statements for which women are famous.

"You'd better say," I retorted, "that in love matters all men, old and young, are idiots."

She—They say Mr. Wagstaff was driven to his grave. He—Well, he couldn't very well walk.—Boston Transcript.

SELLING EARLY POTATOES.

Marketing Through Shipping Associations Explained by Government.

The perishable nature of the immature potato renders it necessary to place it upon the market in such quantities only as will admit of immediate consumption. Producers in regions where the growing of early potatoes has been extensively developed appreciate this and have provided for this condition by organizing shipping associations through which the crop is graded, often trademarked, and distributed chiefly in carload lots. The efforts of the association, being in constant adequate communication with the various markets, are thus improved regarding the most satisfactory condition for every requirement which may be necessary. It is the purpose of these associations, however, to conduct their business in such a way that the product can be sold at a shipping point instead of by consignment, and the best organized associations are usually able to do this.

The great advantage of such a system of selling is that it enables the growers in a small city or town to buy direct from the producer instead of through another city broker. It enables the consumer to obtain fresh products, as they are shipped direct from the point of production to the place of consumption. The plan carries other benefits which are of great moment to the producer. He is enabled to sell in carload lots at shipping point, thus saving to himself the cost of transportation, which ranges from 7 to 15 per cent of the gross selling price. The exchange secures a much wider distribution of the crop, with the result that overstocked markets are much less likely than under the consignment system. Transportation companies provide better service, and claims are more promptly settled through the exchange than in the case of individuals. This plan enables the producer to be his own salesman. It transfers the distributing point from the city to the field, where it should be. It brings the market to the field instead of the product to the market. The exchange becomes the farmer's commission house, and it is much easier to keep informed regarding the transactions of a home association than of a foreign concern.—United States Department of Agriculture Bulletin.

TO MAKE AN ASPARAGUS BED

Directions by a Successful Virginia Grower of the Vegetable.

The first and most important feature in a good permanent asparagus bed is having a piece of good soil, naturally well drained and handy to the house. It should be the best spot in the garden.

Make your soil as rich as you can with thoroughly rotted manure, and set out three-year-old plants so that the crown is just below the surface. Have the roots of each plant well spread out and cover lightly with the richest dirt you can find, or—if you are in no hurry for results you can plant the seed either in a bed to be transplanted or where they will remain in the bed. I prefer the latter method, declares a Virginia correspondent of Farm Progress. And when I say "bed" I mean what the term "garden bed" implies—that is, a rich, deep soil, full of humus as well as fresh organic matter, in a dry and sunny place and have the rows to run east and west.

If you plant three-year-old plants you can cut some asparagus the next season if you are in a hurry, but it is better not to. Enough space must be left between the rows to cultivate and walk in when cutting the roots in the spring.

But I would not stop at merely making a bed or two. If you have some rich land along fence rows where there is space enough for something to grow scatter some seed, and the chances are that in a few years you will be getting as much asparagus from these out of the way places as from the beds that you cultivate and pay special attention to. And another point, when you are planting asparagus if you are near a good town it may be well to plant for a great deal more than the family needs. No other vegetable is more salable.

If there are any who feel the need of more information they can get bulletins on the subject from their state experiment station or the department of agriculture at Washington.

As to those who already have asparagus beds, I will say that it will be well worth while to put on them a good thick coat of good manure from farm or stock manure. It is better to do it in the fall or winter.

HELP ALONG YOUR ALFALFA.

Spring Tooth Harrow Improved By Changing Shape of Teeth.

I include a picture each of two teeth of a spring tooth harrow, one showing the broad point as set and the other showing the point as I have had it changed to exhibit the alfalfa," says an Ohio correspondent of the Kansas Farmer.

"I have this season used a harrow with the teeth made over, as shown. In my alfalfa, I believe it is superior to all other implements so far put out for this purpose. It will destroy the surface rooted grasses, that is, the grass and crab grass, that are such enemies to alfalfa. If alfalfa is taken at one year old and cultivated after each cutting, if so often is necessary it can be kept clean, and this with out noticeable injury to the alfalfa roots. It is very seldom that a crown will be cut off. The spring tooth harrow has been used at the Ohio and Illinois stations with the teeth as sent out from the factories, but so far as I know have not been changed as I use them.

"With changing they will not cut so well in hard ground and throw too much soil over the young sprouts, although this covering of the young plants does not seem to make much difference. The harrow as I use it can be worked in the alfalfa till it is six inches high without injury to it. It is certainly superior to any of the disk or cutaway harrows used in your state."

Some farmers say they have no use for the experiment stations, or they cite nothing for practical information, but the man who keeps posted and is always trying to get something better to improve his farm and stock is the man who gets the price for what he has to sell.

Getting After Hawks.
A young farmer near Dover, Tenn., has devised a simple device for catching hawks. He has erected a pole about thirty-five feet high and set a steel trap on top. This being a new perch, the hawks invariably fly to it.

The best way to preserve a manure pile is not to have any. Manure produces the greatest benefits when placed upon the ground immediately. One of the best implements on the farm is the manure spreader.

The Hum of the Hive.

For extracted honey nothing is better than the sixty pound new tin can, two of which come in a case. This style of package appeals to the buyer of honey, as the honey can be quickly liquefied in the cans.

There is money in beekeeping if it is managed properly. Beekeeping is being carried on with both profit and pleasure by many thousands of people in all parts of the United States, and while, as a rule, it is not the sole occupation of those who pursue it, there are many places where an experienced beekeeper can make a good living by devoting his entire time and attention to this line of work.—United States Department of Agriculture.

Whenever I have come without pollen I have no moths, but when I have pollen in the combs I have the moths, says a Texas beekeeper.

It is not good policy to thin honey in any way; in fact, most consumers of honey like it as thick as they can get it.

Change all falling or slow queues promptly and broad from the best you can secure, thus raising the standard of your stock step by step and improving the average year by year.

would be called—and shy boys from the farms, but for the most part the men she saw imbibed her, and she kept out of their sight as much as possible. Her keenest pleasures, almost her only pleasures, lay in the occasional brief visits of Cavanagh as he rode in for his mail.

Lize perceived all these attacks on her daughter and was infuriated by them. Her brows were knotted with care as well as with pain, and she incessantly urged Virginia to go back to Sulphur. "I'll send you money to pay your board till you strike a job." But to this the girl would not agree, and the business by reason of her presence went on increasing from day to day.

To Redfield Lize one day confessed her pain. "I ought to send for that doctor up there, but the plain truth is I'm afraid of him. I don't want to know what's the matter of me. It's his job to tell me I'm sick, and I'm scared of his verdict."

"Nonsense!" he replied. "You can't afford to put off getting him much longer. I'm going back tonight, but I'll be over again tomorrow. Why don't you let me bring him down? It will save you $12. And, by the way, suppose you let me take Lee Virginia home with me. She looks a bit depressed. An outing will do her good. She's taken hold here wonderfully."

"Hasn't she? But I should have sent her away the very first night. I'm getting to depend on her. I'm plain foolish about her now—can't let her out of my sight, and yet I'm off my feed worrying over her. Gregg is getting dangerous. You can't fool me when it comes to men. Curse 'em! They're all alike, every one of them. I won't have my girl mistreated! I tell you that. I'm not fit to be her mother. Now, that's the truth, Reddy, and this rotten little back country town is no place for her. But what can I do? She won't leave me so long as I'm sick, and every day ties her closer to me. I don't know what I'd do without her. If I'm going to die I want her by me when I take my drop, so you see just how I'm placed."

She looked yellow and drawn as she ended, and Redfield was moved by her unwonted tenderness.

"Now, let me advise," he began after a moment's pause. "We mustn't let the girl get homesick. I'll take her home with me this afternoon and bring her back along with a doctor tomorrow."

"All right, but before you go I want to have a private talk. I want to tell you something."

"He warned her away from what promised to be a confession. "Now, now, Eliza, don't tell me anything that requires that tone of voice. I'm a laid person to keep a secret, and you might be sorry for it. I don't want to know anything more about your business than I can guess."

"I don't mean the whisky trade," she explained. "I've cut that all out anyway. It's something more important—It's about Ed and me."

"I don't want to hear that either," he declared. "Let bygones be bygones. What you did then is outlawed anyway. Those were fierce times, and I want to forget them." He looked about. "Let me see Miss Virginia and convey to her Mrs. Redfield's invitation."

"She's in the kitchen, I reckon. Go right out."

He was rather glad of a chance to see the young reformer in action and smiled as he came upon her surrounded by waiters and cooks, busily superintending the preparations for the noon meal, which amounted to a tumult each day.

She saw Redfield, nodded and a few moments later came toward him, flushed and beaming with welcome. "I'm glad to see you again, Mr. Supervisor."

He bowed profoundly. "Mrs. Redfield could be no formal invitation to you to visit Elk Lodge. She is not quite able to take the long ride, else she'd come to you." Here he handed her a note. "I suggest that you go up with me this afternoon, and tomorrow we'll fetch the doctor down to see your mother. What do you say to that?"

Her eyes were dewy with grateful appreciation of his kindness as she answered. "That would be a great pleasure, Mr. Redfield. If mother feels able to spare me."

"I've talked with her. She is anxious to have you go."

Virginia was indeed greatly pleased and pleasantly excited by this message, for she had heard much of Mrs. Redfield's exclusiveness and also of the splendor of her establishment. She hurried away to dress with such a flutter of joyous anticipation that Redfield felt quite repaid for the pressure he had put upon his wife to induce her to write that note. "You may leave Lize Wetherford out of the count, my dear," he had said. "There is nothing of her discernible in the girl. Virginia is a lady. I don't know where she got it, but she's a gentle woman by nature."

It was not and still in town, but no sooner was the car in motion than both heat and dust were forgotten. Redfield's machine was not large, and as he was content to go at moderate speed, conversation was possible.

He was of that sunny, optimistic, ever youthful nature which finds delight in human companionship under any conditions whatsoever. He accepted this girl for what she seemed—a fresh, unspoiled child. He saw nothing cheap or commonplace in her and was not disposed to impose any of her father's wild delusions upon her calendar. He had his misgivings as to her future. That was the main reason why he had said to Mrs. Redfield, "The girl must be helped." Afterward he had said "sustained."

It was inevitable that the girl should soon refer to the ranger, and Redfield was as complimentary of him as she could wish. "Ross hasn't a fault but one, and that's a negative one—he doesn't care a hang about getting on, as they say over in England. He's content just to do the duty of the moment. He made a good cowpuncher and a good soldier, but as for promotion—he laughs when I mention it."

"He told me that he hoped to be chief forester," protested Virginia.

"Oh, yes, he says that, but do you know he'd rather be where he is, riding over the hills, than live in London. You should see his cabin some time. It's most wonderful, really. His walls are covered with bookshelves of his own manufacture and chairs of his own design. Where the boy got the skill I don't see. Heaven knows, his sisters are conventional enough. He's capable of being supervisor, but he won't live in town and work in an office. He's like an Indian in his love of the open."

CHAPTER VI

IN THE VIOLENT PAST.

THINKING about Cavanagh was quite too absorbingly interesting to both Lee and Redfield to permit of any study of the landscape, which went by as if dismissed by the chariot wheels of some contemptuous magician. Redfield's eyes were mostly on the road in the manner of the careful auto driver, but when he did look up it was to admire the color and pulse of his son's mate, who made the landscape of small account.

She kept the conversation to the desired point. "Mr. Cavanagh's work interests me very much. It seems very important, and it must be new, for I never heard of a forest ranger when I was a child."

"The forester is new, at least in America," he answered. "My dear young lady, you are returned just in the most momentous period in the history of the west. The old dominion of the cattle range—is passing. The supremacy of the cowboy is ended. The cow boss is raising out. The cowboy is pitching alfalfa and swearing horribly as he blisters his hands. Some of the rangers at the moment are men of western training, like Ross, but whose allegiance is now to Uncle Sam. With others that transfer of allegiance is not quite complete; hence the insolence of men like Gregg, who think they can bribe or intimidate these forest guards and so obtain favors. The newer men are college bred, real foresters. But you can't know what it all means till you see Ross or some other ranger on his own heels."

"We'll make up a little party some day and drop down upon him and have him show us about. It's a lonely life, and so the ranger keeps open house. Would you like to go?"

"Oh, yes, indeed. I'm eager to get into the mountains. Every night as I see the sun go down over them I wonder what the world is like up there."

Then he began very delicately to inquire about her eastern experience. There was not much to tell. In a lovely old town not far from Philadelphia, where her aunt lived, she had spent ten years of happy exile. "I was horribly lonely and homesick at first," she said. "Mother wrote only short letters, and my father never wrote at all. I didn't know he was dead then. He was always good to me. He wasn't a bad man, was he?"

"No," responded Redfield without hesitation. "He was very like the rest of us, only a little more reckless and a little more partisan, that's all. He was a dashing horseman and a dead shot, and so naturally a leader of these daredevils. He was popular with both sides of the controversy up to the very moment when he went south to lead the liversiders against the rustlers."

"What was it all about? I never understood it. What were they fighting about?"

"In a sense it was all very simple. You see, Uncle Sam in his carelessness, not knowing why his always left his range to the man who got there first. That was the gentleman. At first there was grass enough for us all, but as we built sheds and corrals about watering places we came to claim rights on the range. We usually secured by fraud homesteads in the sections containing water and so, gun in hand, 'stood off' the man who came after. Gradually, after much shooting and mowing, we parceled out the range and settled down, covering practically the whole state. Our adjustments were not perfect, but our system was working smoothly for us who controlled the range. We had convinced ourselves and pretty nearly everybody else that the state was only fit for cattle grazing and that we were the most competent grazers; furthermore, we were in possession, and no man could come in without our consent."

"However, a very curious law of our own making was our undoing. Of course the 'rustler' or 'junkie roller,' as we contemptuously called the small farmer, began sifting in here and there in spite of our guns, but he was only a mosquito bite in comparison with the trouble which our cowpunchers stirred up. Perhaps you remember enough about the business to know that an unbranded yearling calf without its mother is called a maverick?"

"Yes; I remember that. It belongs to the man who finds him and brands him."

"Precisely. Now, that law worked very nicely so long as the poor cowboy was willing to catch and brand him for his employer, but it proved a 'joker' when he woke up and said to his fellows, 'Why brand these mavericks at $5 per head for this or that outfit when the law says they belong to the man who finds them?'"

Lee Virginia looked up brightly. "That seems right to me."

"Ah, yes, but wait! We cattlemen had large herds, and the probabilities were that the calf belonged to some one of us, whereas the cowboy, having no herd at all, knew the maverick belonged to some one's herd. True, the law said it was his, but the law did not mean to reward the freebooter. Yet that is exactly what it did. At first only a few outlaws took advantage of it, but hard years came on, the cattle business became less and less profitable, we were forced to lay off our men, and so at last the range swarmed with idle cowpunchers. Then came the breakdown in our scheme. The cowboys took to 'mavericking' on their own account. Some of them had the grace to go into partnership with some farmer and so claim a small bunch of cows, but others suddenly and miraculously acquired herds of their own. From keeping within the law they passed to violent methods. They slit the tongues of calves for the purpose of separating them from their mothers. Finding he could not suck, bossy would at last wander away from his dam and so become a maverick. In short, manarchy reigned on the range."

"But surely my father had nothing to do with this?"

"No; your father up to this time had been on good terms with everybody. He had a small herd of cattle down the river, which he owned in common with a man named Hart."

"I remember him."

"He was well thought of by all the big outfits, and when the situation became intolerable and we got together to weed out the rustlers, as these cattle thieves were called, your father was approached and converted to a belief in drastic measures. He had suffered less than the rest of us because of his small herd and the fact that he was very popular among the cowboys. So far as I was concerned, the use of violent methods revolted me. My training in the east had made me a respecter of the law. 'Change the law,' I said. 'The law is all right,' they replied; 'the trouble is with these rustlers. We'll hang a few of 'em, and that will break up the business.'"

Parts of this story came back to the girl's mind, producing momentary flashes of perfect recollection. She heard again the voices of excited men arguing over and over the question of "mavericking," and she saw her father as he rode up to the house that last day before he went south.

Redfield went on. "The whole plan as developed was silly, and I wonder still that Ed Wetherford, who knew the 'rustler' and the cowboy so well, should have lent his aid to it. The gentlemen, some from Cheyenne, some from Denver and a few from New York and Chicago, agreed to finance a sort of vigilante corps composed of men from the outside on the understanding that this policing body should be commanded by one of their own number. Your father was chosen second in command and was to guide the party, for he knew almost every one of the rustlers and could ride directly to their doors."

"I wish he hadn't done that," murmured the girl.

"I must be frank with you, Virginia. I can't excuse that in him. It was a kind of treachery. He must have been warped by his associates. They convinced him by some means that it was his duty, and one fine day the Fork was startled by a messenger who rode in to say that the cattle barons were coming with a hundred Texas bad men to clean out the town and to put their own men into office. This last was silly rot to me, but the people believed it."

BROOD SOWS IN WINTER.

Comfortable Quarters and Careful Feeding Make For Profit.

Success in pork production is largely affected by the attention given to the health and comfort of the brood sow. She should always, especially in winter, be housed in a warm, comfortable place. Preferably this will be a cot well supplied with straw, and having a door which swings both ways, always closing when the sow passes in or out. This cot may well be located at some distance from the feeding place, so that she will get the necessary exercise in running to and fro.

Her food should consist largely of bulky foods, such as milk, roots and clover hay, which will keep her in good condition without fattening. As far as possible, these supplies the bulk should be cut down, less water should be given and more protein and oily foods should be fed so as to keep the sow in a laxative condition. She should be disturbed as little as possible. If she is allowed to get nervous or excited the effect may be seen upon the litter in an excitable temperament, which lessens the rapidity of their growth.

CAUSE OF ROPY MILK.

Not the Fault of the Cow, but of Surrounding Conditions.

There are various ideas afloat among men as to the cause of ropy milk, says Board's Dairyman. Farmers in general think it is due to some condition of the cow, inflammation in the udder or the like. But scientific investigations say not so.

The germ that causes ropy milk, B. lactis viscosus, finds its natural habitat in water. It will flourish in ice cold water, but it grows with difficulty at blood heat, says Professor Ward, which proves conclusively that it is not the result of disease in the cow. Starting with the proved fact that the disease originates in water, here are some of the causes as stated by Professor Ward in his book, "Pure Milk and the Public Health":

Cows wallow in muddy sloughs and the germs falling from the body of the cow into the milk pail; foul stables, where this trouble exists; the organisms are found in the floor dust of milk rooms; infected water used for cooling milk in cans; the corrugated milk cooler may have a leak whereby the water is mixed with the milk.

The bad practice of merely rinsing the milk utensils at night in cold water and not scalding them out is another cause, and a quite frequent one. Indeed, unclean utensils constitute the most frequent cause for bad milk.

Grinding Grain For Hogs.

The gain from grinding corn is comparatively small. Numerous experiments have been made with other grains to determine the effect of grinding. It being generally supposed that grinding would be more effective in the case of small grains than it would be with corn. Grinding small grains, such as peas, barley, oats and rye, has almost invariably proved beneficial. Sometimes the advantage of the ground grain has been very slight and sometimes very marked, but the general evidence indicates that it is advisable, when practicable, to grind such grains. When the cost of grinding is excessively high the practice may not be advisable, but under ordinary circumstances it is the safe course. According to a compilation of experiment station results made by G. M. Rommel (bulletin 47, United States department of agriculture), the average saving effected by grinding small grains is 12.26 per cent, which is double the saving effected by grinding corn in Wisconsin experiments.

Yorkshires Prolific.

Eight pigs per sow have been raised at the northeast experiment station at Grand Rapids, Minn., the past three years. The Yorkshire breed is noted for its large litters and strong constitution. The brood sows are wintered on second crop of clover, hulled roots, skum milk and half a pound each of grain daily. They are comfortably housed, with access to a yard in the daytime. Exercise is an important element in their care. The sows are bred in December, farrow in March or early April and raise but one litter a year.

Remedy For Splints.

Clip off the hair and paint the enlargements with the mix of iodine three times a week. If there is any lameness present give the animal absolute rest and when the inflammation has abated keep the parts covered with cold wet compresses of cotton batting and bandages. In bad cases blistering or even puncture firing and lancing becomes necessary.

Literary NotesRaising Early Broilers

"The up-to-date broiler plant consists of an incubator-celler, a nursery, or brooder-house, as it is usually called, and a broiler-house," says Kate V. Saint-Maur in Woman's Home Companion for February. "Both the latter are divided into small pens, about two feet wide and five feet long. In the nursery-house, the top ends of the pens are enclosed like boxes to the depth of about a foot and a half, and have hot water pipes running through them to furnish heat for the chicks to brood under. A banner curtain cut into strips falls from the top of the enclosed part to divide it from the rest of the pen, which runs down to the outer wall of the house, where a large window lets in light and sun. The pens should have board floors slightly elevated above the main floor, to avoid dampness, and the divisions are made with a foot-board about nine inches high, and one-inch netting two feet above that. The brooder-house is divided in the same way, but the hot-water pipes only run around the walls of the house, as the birds don't need the immediate heat to brood under, after they leave the nursery, when they are five or six weeks old.

"But if you can afford the proper equipment, one or two incubators can be run in the cellar of the house or an unused room where there is no other heat. Individual broilers can be used in place of the nursery or brooder-house, if you have any light outbuilding to stand them in. If fact, I like the individual brooder better for the nursery period than the pipe-house system, because it is so easy to heat as many as are needed, and with the pipe system the entire house has to be heated, even if you are only going to use one section."

A CAMPAIGN OF EDUCATION

Work of Western Michigan Development Bureau

LAST WEEK'S ARTICLE CONTINUED

Advocates More and Better Schools, Churches and Granges

Has Nothing to Sell; Work to Make Known to World Advantages of Western Michigan Region.

While it is true that Michigan has cause for congratulation because of the census bureau's figures just published, showing that the value of her farm lands has increased 39 per cent and farm buildings 50 per cent during the past decade, yet a greater cause for rejoicing is the fact that the farm unit in Michigan still remains small, 92 acres, and that she has nearly 3,000 more independent farmers than in 1900.

Much remains to be done, for while the value of farms and farm buildings have increased we are far behind the old agricultural states of Indiana and Iowa in this respect, the percentage of increase in Michigan being 39 per cent, in Indiana 92 per cent, and in Iowa 117 3/4 per cent. On the other hand, while Michigan has made a gain of nearly 3,000 in the number of independent farmers, Indiana has lost 7,000 and Iowa 12,000.

The Western Michigan Development Bureau has a great work and an untold field before it, and whether it succeeds or fails, as so many similar organizations have done, lies largely with the people of Western Michigan. To be successful the bureau must have behind it a public sentiment and opinion strong and powerful enough to counteract local selfishness, narrowness and special influences, which will, if unchecked, reduce this great and beneficent movement for the betterment of a whole region to the level of ward politics, and end in corruption and defeat. What we need to learn and believe is that we cannot help the other fellow without helping ourselves, and that we keep what we give away.

The affairs of the Western Bureau are managed by a board of forty-nine directors. Two directors are elected from the membership of each of the twenty counties in the bureau, to which is added nine directors from the transportation lines operating in the bureau's territory. These directors serve without pay, and so far have given freely of their time to the work of betterment for which the bureau stands.

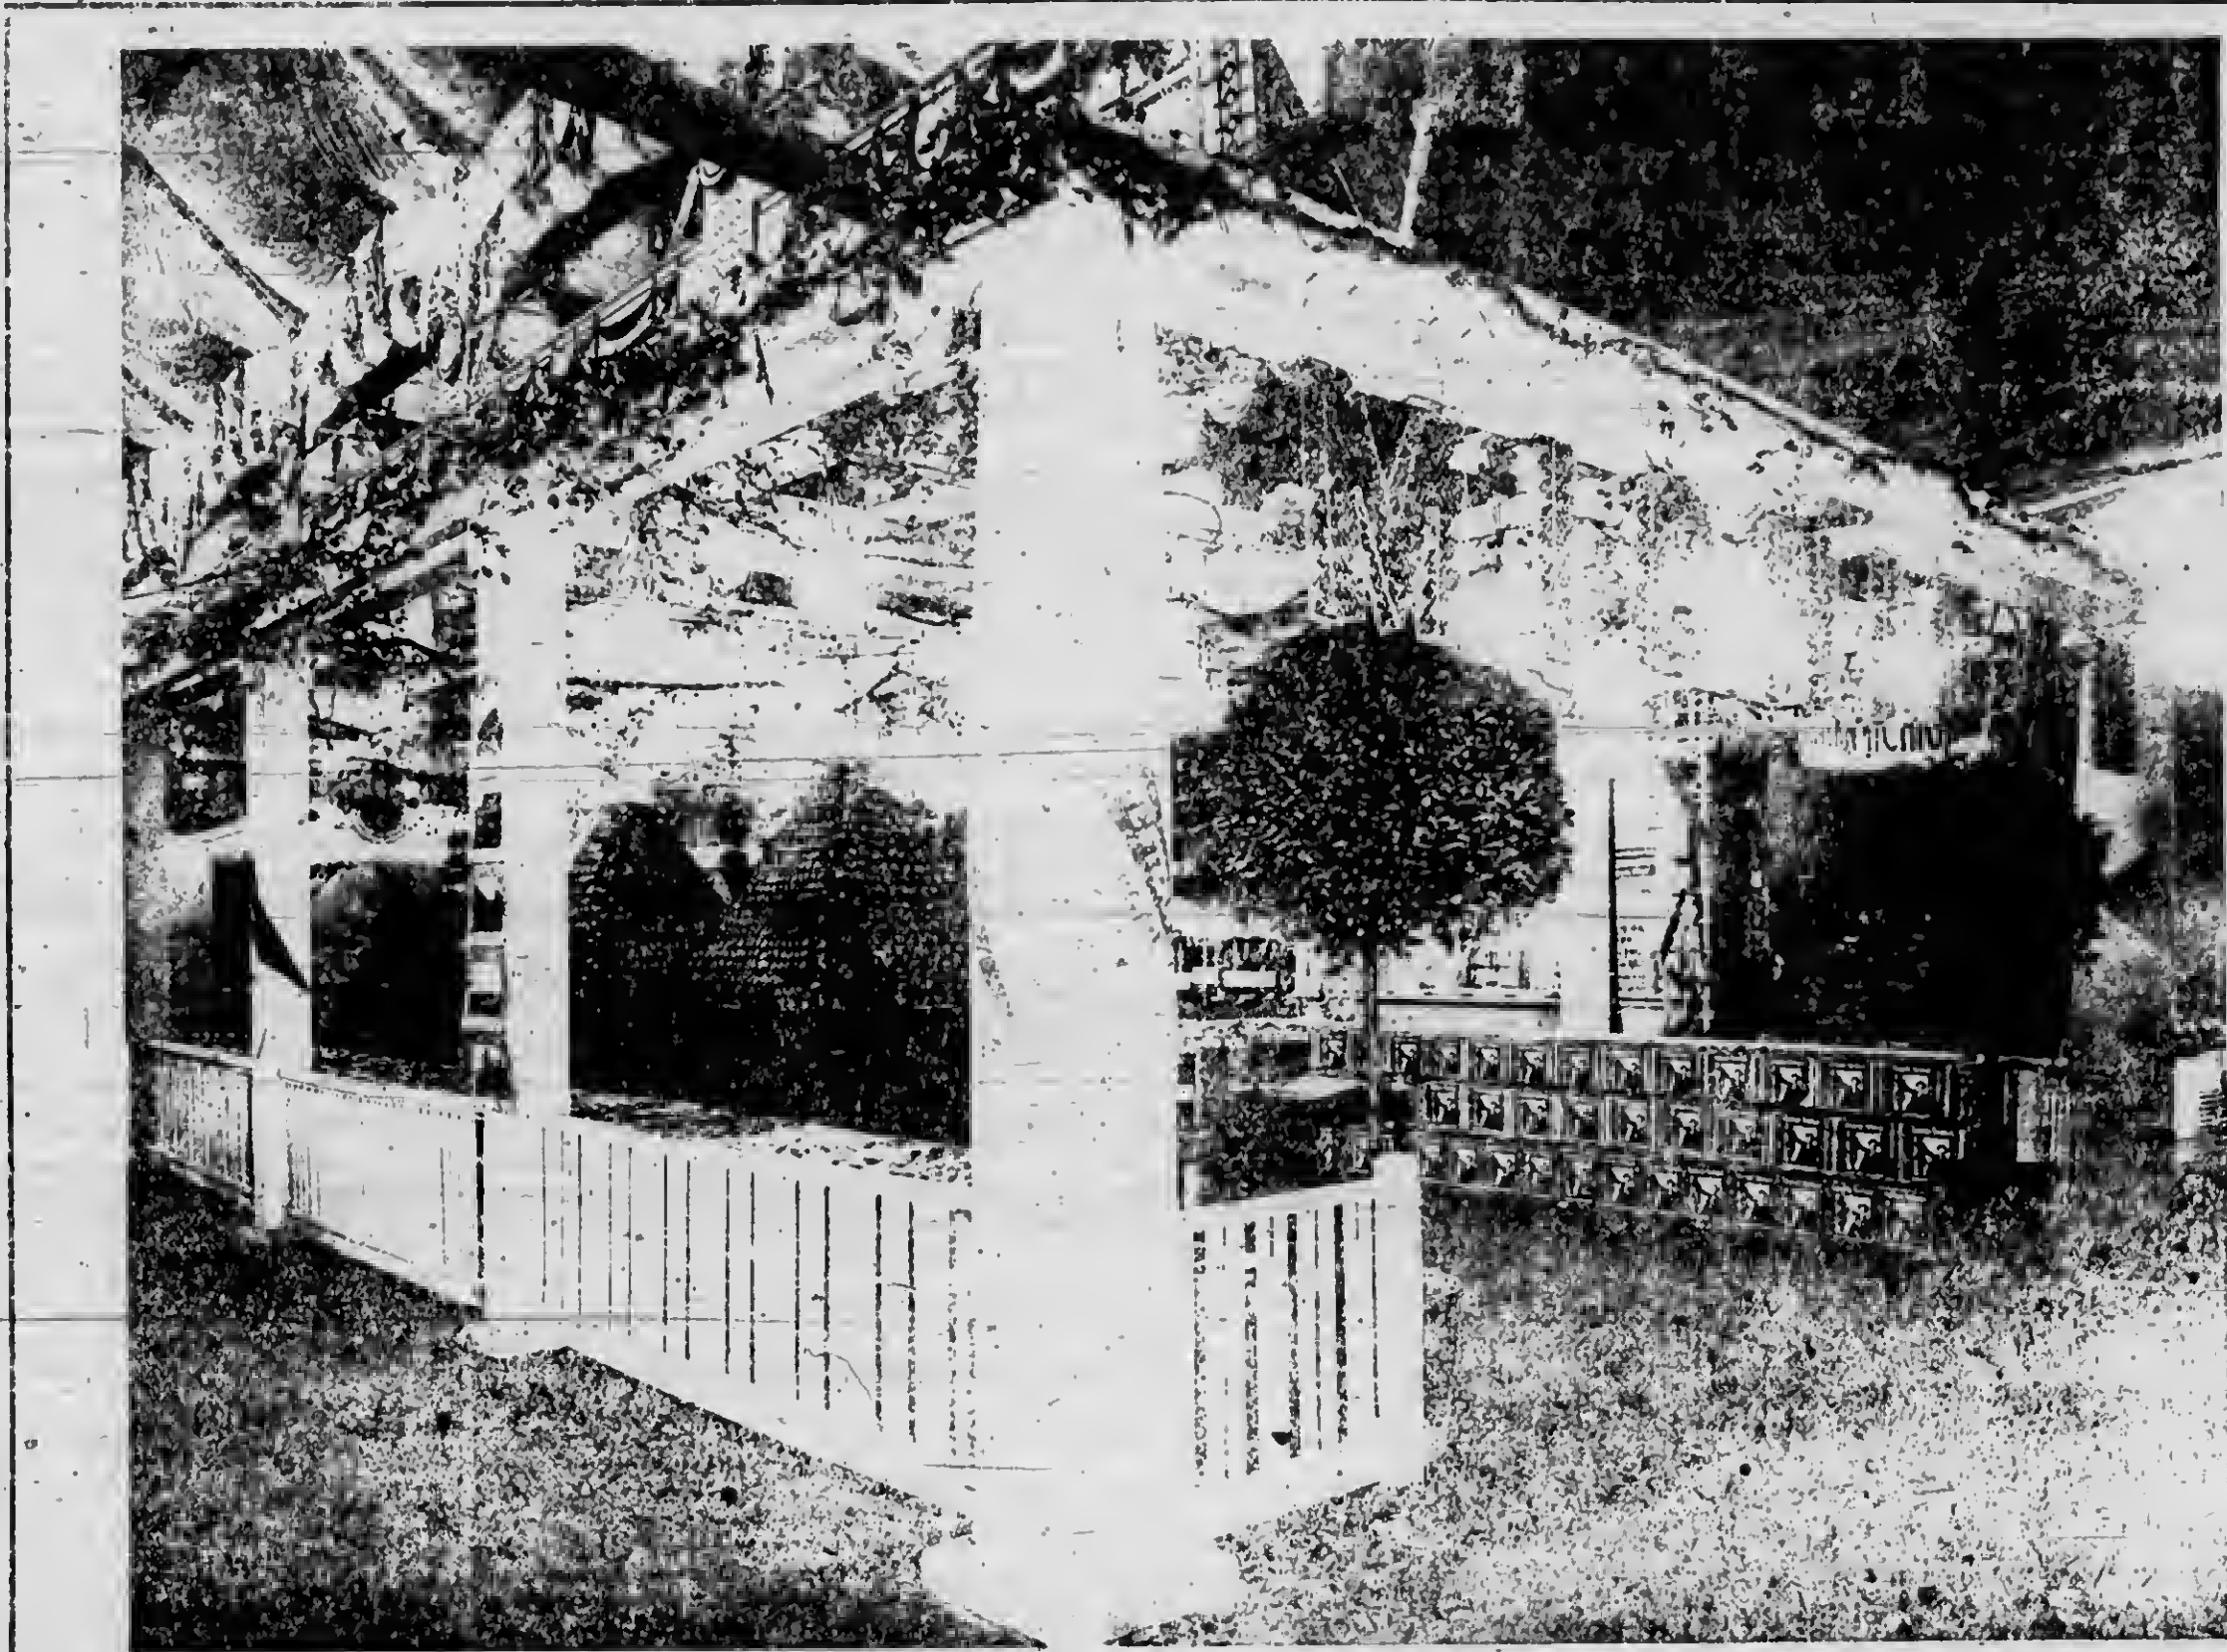

The offices are located at Traverse City, where the correspondence and detail work is carried on.

The funds for carrying on the work of the bureau are raised about half by taxation, and the other half by private subscriptions. The transportation companies assist according to what they consider the results are worth to them.

Membership in the bureau is open to residents in its territory. The membership fee is $1 and the annual dues $1.

As an organization it has no land or chattels of any kind to sell. Its charter expressly forbids it from engaging in any business which would result in pecuniary profit, so that it has no selfish purpose to serve. Its work is to make known to the world the advantages which western Michigan has to offer to the farmer, the fruit grower, the manufacturer, the merchant and those seeking recreation and renewed health. This work has two phases. The first—and in the opinion of the writer the most important—is the education of the people of western Michigan in better methods and to fuller realization of the great possibilities which this remarkable region possesses.

This educational work is carried on by the dissemination of reading matter telling the people what they ought to know in order to make the most of their opportunities. The pamphlets and booklets are prepared by practical men who give the results of their experience in the selection of stock, the proper kind of location, soil, fertility, drainage, cultivation, pruning, packing and marketing the

MORE THAN DOUBLED

Membership of County Farmer's Institute Society

But Resume of Work in this County for the Winter.

The raising of alfalfa has received a good deal of attention, and as a result over 500 farmers have been induced to plant alfalfa during the present year. This is a very large increase over the previous year, when only about 250 farmers planted alfalfa. The secretary of the county farmer's institute society, who is in charge of the alfalfa campaign, says that the success of the campaign is due to the fact that the farmers have been educated in the proper methods of raising alfalfa. He also says that the success of the campaign is due to the fact that the farmers have been educated in the proper methods of raising alfalfa.

In connection with the alfalfa campaign, the bureau has been very busy in the winter. It has been holding meetings in various parts of the county, and has been distributing pamphlets and booklets on the proper methods of raising alfalfa. It has also been holding meetings in various parts of the county, and has been distributing pamphlets and booklets on the proper methods of raising alfalfa.

Natural conditions determine, to a large extent, the possibilities of development possessed by any locality, and in many cases these conditions are such that the only way to develop the locality is by the use of artificial means. This is the case with the western Michigan region, which is a region of natural disadvantages. The only way to develop this region is by the use of artificial means, and the only way to do this is by the use of artificial means.

COMING HIS WAY

Elmer N. Clark's Candidacy Meeting with Universal Approval.

The candidacy of E. N. Clark for the Republican nomination for circuit judge is being received with approval all over the county. His long and successful career at the bar of this section has given him a wide acquaintance and as he is endowed with the faculty of making warm friends wherever he goes, he has a host of workers in every community who are doing their best to help him achieve the nomination that every lawyer looks forward to. Clark's legal ability and fitness for the position, there is no question, is being universally conceded, and few lawyers in Northern Michigan have demonstrated more skill in the handling of important cases.

A man with the proper legal training, who has served his apprenticeship in practice, who has been found on the people's side in every contest, a progressive who believes in a square deal for everybody, is there any reason why you should not put your X in front of his name at the primary?

TO REDUCE RATES

On Express Matter—Bill of Senator Scott.

Places Express Companies Under Railroad Commission.

Senator Frank D. Scott has introduced the express rate bill, which long has been up his sleeve and which is in harmony with the recommendations of Governor Osborn. This bill is radical in form and means a reduction in express rates, placing them nearly fifteen per cent lower than at present.

This bill places the express companies and their rates under the supervision and control of the state railroad commission. It prescribes a maximum and minimum rate of transportation of merchandise. It provides for the publication of joint rates on all express lines, which means that express companies must give through rates to any point whether on a direct line or by transfer to another and guarantee that the transportation will be direct and without transfer.

The maximum rate permitted is fixed as follows: for ten pounds, 1 to 15 miles, 75c; 15 to 25 miles, 80c; 25 to 35 miles, 85c; 35 to 45 miles, 90c; 45 to 55 miles, 95c; 55 to 65 miles, 1.00; 65 to 75 miles, 1.05; COMFORTING WORDS

Many a Charlevoix Household Will Find Them So.

To have the pains and aches of a back removed; to be entirely free from annoying, dangerous urinary disorders is enough to make any kidney sufferer grateful. To tell how this great change can be brought about will prove comforting words to hundreds of Charlevoix readers.

Nelson Burdo, 110 South B. St., Charlevoix, Mich., says: "Some twenty-five years ago I went to Detroit for an operation but the physician at the hospital told me that he could not take my case on account of the disordered condition of my kidneys. He advised me to use Doan's Kidney Pills and I did so. After I had taken the contents of four boxes, I was completely cured and I was then able to have the operation performed. The principal symptom of my kidney trouble was a dull backache, sometimes accompanied by pains in my kidneys. I could hardly stoop or lift and whenever I caught cold, it settled on my kidneys, making me feel worse. The kidney secretions were highly colored and too frequent in passage and my whole system was run down. Doan's Kidney Pills helped me so greatly that I am only too glad to recommend them."

Mr. Burdo gave the above testimony in August 1906 and when interviewed in July, 1908 he added: "You may continue to publish my former endorsement of Doan's Kidney Pills for the relief they gave me has been permanent. I have recommended this remedy to other kidney sufferers and in every case benefit has followed its use."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Nilburg Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Neighborhood Notes

In a supplementary ruling handed down in Delta county circuit court Judge Flannigan throws out nine of the thirteen counts in the indictment in the criminal libel suit brought by Gov. Osborn against F. L. Baldwin, editor of the Escanaba Journal. The suit was the outcome of an article published in the Journal last August. Judge Flannigan holds that none of the article is libelous, except the first and thirteenth paragraphs. As to the fifth and eleventh paragraphs he is uncertain. The ruling is considered a victory for the defense.

Alleging negligence on the part of the defendant and for $10,000 damages has been instituted in circuit court by Albina Lion against the Boyne City, Gaylord and Alpena Railroad company. The plaintiff through her attorneys, Roger Wykes and Fred P. Heib, alleges that she was a school teacher at Boyne City. She charges that while crossing the defendant's tracks October 11, 1908, she stumbled and fell striking the steel rails on her knees. By the fall she charges, one knee was injured so it was necessary for her to go to a hospital and submit to an operation. Physicians have told her, the bill of complaint states, that it will be necessary to have the knee cap removed. The plaintiff blames the defendant for not having the sidewalk leading across the tracks in proper condition, according to the bill of complaint, and she declares she has been permanently injured.

At a meeting of the board of trustees of the Michigan employment institution for the blind it was shown that last month, was best from a financial standpoint. The cash receipts from brooms and other produce were $3,350.40. The output of the broom shop was the largest, $1,038.91. There are seventy-two inmates.

The new electric line which is to furnish Buckley with lights, will pass through the big stock and dairy farm of G. A. Brigham, better known as the Buckley Stock Farm. When the line is completed all the machinery now used to carry on the dairy business will be run by electricity. At the present time machinery is propelled by a monster gasoline engine. This farm is turning out an immense amount of first class butter each day, besides making big shipments of cattle and hogs to outside markets. This is indeed one of the largest and best stock farms in Michigan.

Representative Amerson, of Antrim county, is working to have the local option law amended so as to make the manufacture of wine and cider, now permissible in dry counties, illegal. Whether the honorable gentleman is sincerely desirous of drawing the lines still tighter, or merely wants to take a fall out of the farmers who enjoy the wine and cider making privilege, is not readily apparent.

Prohibition is simply a question of law enforcement. If the authorities are lax, liquor will be sold in a prohibition state and the evils of drunkenness will remain. If the people follow up their vote in favor of prohibition by a vote in favor of the kind of man who will see to it that the laws are made to mean something, prohibition will be something more than an empty name. The failure of prohibition in some states is not due to causes beyond control. It may be difficult to enforce the statute in a community where liquor has been freely sold and craving appetites have been created. Men who feel that they cannot do without liquor will resort to any means to obtain it. But gradually the question of law enforcement should become easier. As Governor Hoch says, in Kansas a generation of young men has grown up without seeing the open saloon. Doubtless a far greater proportion of these men are total abstainers than would be the case if they came in contact with saloons every day of their lives. What may be difficult at the outset should be comparatively easy in the long run.

Without going into the question whether prohibition is right or wrong, the question whether prohibition can be made reasonably effective if the people want it so, admits of only one answer.—Wilkes Barre Record.

The girl was trailing now. "I remember! I remember the men who rode into the town to give the alarm. I was scared almost breathless."

"I was in Sulphur City and did not hear of it till it was nearly all over," Redfield resumed, his speech showing a little of the excitement which thrilled through the girl's voice. "Well, the first act of vengeance was so ill considered that it practically ended the whole campaign. The invaders fell upon and killed two ranchers, one of whom was probably not a rustler at all, but a peaceable settler, and the other one they most barbarously hanged. More than this, they attacked and vainly tried to kill two settlers whom they met on the road—German farmers, with no connection, so far as known, with the thieves. These men escaped and gave the alarm. In a few hours the whole range was aflame with vengeful fire. The forks, as you may recall, was like a swarm of immbles. Every man and boy was armed and mounted. The storekeepers distributed guns and ammunition. The 'punch rollers,' rustlers and townsmen rode out to meet the invaders."

The girl paled with memory of it. "It was terrible. I went all day without eating, and for two nights we were all too excited to sleep. It seemed as if the world were coming to an end. Mother cried because they wouldn't let her go with them. She didn't know father was leading the 'other army.'"

"She must have known soon, for it was reported that your father was among them. She certainly knew when they were driven to earth in that log fort, for they were obliged to restrain her by force from going to your father. As I run over those furious days it all seems incredible, like a sudden reversion to barbarism."

"How did it all end? The soldiers came, didn't they?"

"Yes; the long arm of Uncle Sam reached out and took hold upon the necks of both parties. I guess your father and his band would have died right there had not the regular army interfered. It only required a sergeant wearing Uncle Sam's uniform to come among those armed and furious cowboys and remove their prisoners."

"I saw that. It was very strange—that sergeant was so young and so brave."

He turned and smiled at her. "Do you know who that was?"

Her eyes flashed. She drew her breath with a gasp. "Was it Mr. Cavanagh?"

"Yes, it was Ross. He was serving in the regular army at the time. He has told me since that he felt no fear whatever. Uncle Sam's blue coat was like Sheriff's maple armor," he said.

"It was the kind of thing the mounted police of Canada had been called upon to do many a time, and I went in and got my men. That ended the war, so far as violent measures went, and it really ended the sovereignty of the cattlemen. The power of the 'nestor' has steadily increased from that moment."

"But my father—what became of him? They took him away to the east, and that is all I ever knew. What do you think became of him?"

"I could never make up my mind. All sorts of rumors come to us concerning him. As a matter of fact, the state authorities sympathized with the cattle barons, and my own opinion is that your father was permitted to escape. He was afterward seen in Texas, and later it was reported that he had been killed there."

The girl sat still, listening to the fireless whirr of the machine and looking out at the purpling range with tearful eyes. At last she said, "I shall never think of my father as a bad man—he was always so gentle to me."

"You need not condemn him, my dear young lady. The people of the forks—some of them, at least—consider him a traitor and regard you as the daughter of a renegade; but what does it matter? Each year sees the old west diminish, and, already, in the work of the forest service, law and order advance. Notwithstanding all the shouting of herders and the beating to death of sheep, no hostile shot has ever been fired within the bounds of a national forest. In the work of the forest rangers lies the hope of ultimate peace and order over all the public lands."

The girl fell silent again, her mind filled with larger conceptions of life than her judgment had hitherto been called upon to meet. She knew that Redfield was right, and yet that world of the past—the world of the swift herdsman and his trailing, long-borne, half-wild blue-still appeared to her imagination. The west of her girlhood seemed heroic in memory. Even the quiet account of it to which she had just listened could not conceal its epic largeness of movement. The part which troubled her most was her father's treachery to his neighbors. That he should deny, that he should kill men in honorable warfare, she could understand, but not his treachery, his desertion of her mother and herself.

She came back to dwell at last on the action of that slim young soldier who had calmly ridden through the infuriated mob. She remembered that she had thrilled even then at the vague and impersonal power which he represented. To her childish mind he seemed to bear a charm, like the heroes of her story books—something which made him invulnerable.

After a long pause Redfield spoke again. "The memory of your father will make life for a time a bit hard for you in Sulphur City. Perhaps your mother's advice is sound. Why not come to Sulphur City, which is almost entirely of the new spirit?"

"If I can get my mother to come, too, I will be glad to do so, for I hate the fork. But I will not leave her there, sick and alone."

"Much depends upon the doctor's examination tomorrow."

They had topped the divide now between the fork and Sulphur creek basin, and the green fields, the alfalfa meadows and the painted barnhouses thickened beneath them. Strange how significant all these signs were now! A few days ago they had appeared doubtful improvements; now they represented the oncoming dominion of the east. They meant cleanliness and decent speech, good bread and sweet butter.

Redfield swept through the town, then turned up the stream directly to ward the high wall of the range, which was ragged and abrupt at this point. They passed several charming farmhouses, and the western sky grew ever more glorious with its plum color and saffron, and the range reasserted its mastery over the girl. At last they came to the very jaws of the canyon, and there, in a deep natural grove of lofty cottonwood trees, Redfield passed before a high rustic gate which marked the beginning of his estate. The driveway was of gravel, and the trimmings of transplanted shrubs and pine trees showed the care of the professional gardener.

The house was far from being a castle. Indeed, it was very like a house in Bryn Mawr, except that it was built entirely of half-hewn logs, with a wide projecting roof. Giant hydrangeas and other flowering shrubs bordered the drive, and on the rustic terrace a lady in white was waiting.

Redfield slowed down and scrambled ungraciously out. But his voice was charming as he said: "Eleanor, this is Miss Wetherford. She was at the point of getting the blues, so I brought her away," he explained.

Mrs. Redfield, quite as urban as the house, was a slim little woman of delicate habit, very far from the ordinary conception of a rancher's wife. Her manner was politely considerate, but not heatedly cordial (the visitor was not precisely hers; and, though she warmed a little after looking into Virginia's face, she could not by any stretch of phrase be called cordial).

"Are you tired? Would you like to lie down before dinner?" she asked.

"Oh, no, indeed. Nothing ever tires me," Virginia responded, with a smile.

"You look like one in perfect health," continued her hostess in the envious tone of one who knew all too well what ill health meant. "Let me show you to your room."

The house was not precisely the palace the cowboy had reported it to be, but it was charmingly decorated, and the furnishings were tasteful. To the girl it was as if she had been transported with instant magic from the horrible little cow town back to the Virginia's heart was dancing with delight of this home as she came down the stairs a little later. As they talked Mrs. Redfield studied the girl with increasing interest and favor and soon got at her point of view. She even secured a little more of her story which matched fairly well with the account her husband had given. Her prejudices were swept away, and she treated her young guest as one well born and well educated woman treats another.

At last she said: "We dress for dinner, but my truck you have will do. We are not ironclad in our rules. There will be some neighbors in, but it isn't in any sense a party."

Lee Virginia went to her room, high upon a new conception of the possibilities of the west. It was glorious to think that one could enjoy the refinement, the comfort, of the east at the same time that one dwelt within the inspiring shadow of the range. Her hands were a-tremble as she put on the bright muslin gown which was all she had for evening wear. She felt very much like the schoolgirl again, and after she had done her best to look nice she took a seat in the little rocker with intent to compose herself for her meeting with strangers. "I wish we were dining without visitors," she said as she heard a carriage drive up. A little later a galloping horse entered the yard and stopped at the door.

She heard voices in the hall and among them one with a very English accent, one that sounded precisely like those she had heard on the stage.

At last she dared wait no longer and, taking courage from necessity, descended the stairs, a pleasant picture of vigorous yet somewhat subdued maidenhood.

CHAPTER VII.
TWO ON THE VERANDA.

REDFIELD met his young guest in dinner coat, looking extremely urban, and presented his "friend and neighbor, Mr. Enderby."

Enderby turned out to be the owner of the voice with the English accent which Lee Virginia had heard in the hall, but he was very nice, and a moment later Mrs. Redfield entered with Mrs. Enderby, a large lady with a smiling face. Then a voice she knew spoke from behind her: "I don't need a presentation. Miss Wetherford and I have already met."

She turned to meet Ross Cavanagh, the young ranger.

"How did you get here?" she asked in wonder.

"I rode across the hills. It's not far."

He, too, was in evening dress, and as she stared at him in surprise he laughingly protested. "Please don't underestimate this coat too closely. It's the only one I've owned for ten years, and this is the only house in which I'd dare to wear it."

One of the guests was State Senator Bridges, a farmerlike, elderly man wearing a badly fitting serge suit. He was markedly western. So was his wife, who looked rather uneasy and hot.

Virginia and Ross, being the only young folk at the table, were seated together, and Enderby remarked privately, "Ross, you're in luck."

"I know I am," he replied heartily.

He was, as Redfield had said, highly susceptible, made so by his solitary life in the mountains, and to be seated close beside this maid of the valley stirred his blood to the danger point. It was only by an effort of the will that he kept in touch with the conversation.

"I hadn't the least thought of seeing you here," said Virginia. "How did you happen to come?"

"Redfield telephoned me at the mill, and I came at once. I haven't been here since May, and I just thought I'd take a half day off. Luckily my understanding was with me. I left him 'on the job.'"

He did not tell her that she was the principal reason for this sudden descent upon Elk Lodge, and also that Redfield knew the killing ride he had taken in order to be in at the beginning of the dinner. The girl's face and voice, especially her voice, had been with him night and day, as he went about his solitary duties. Her life problem had come to fill his mind to a disturbing degree, and he was eager to know more of her and of her struggle against the vice and vulgarity of the forks.

"How is your mother?" he asked a few minutes later.

"Not at all well. Mr. Redfield is to take the doctor back as is tomorrow. The ecstasy died out of her face, and the flexible lips drooped with troubled pining. 'I am afraid she suffers more than she will admit.'"

"She needs a rest and change. She should get away from her seat at that cash register and return to the open air. A touch of camp life would help her. She sticks too close to her work."

"I know she does, but she won't let me relieve her, even for an hour. It isn't because she doesn't trust me; she says it's because she doesn't want me sitting there—so publicly. She doesn't oppose my housekeeping any more."

"You certainly have made the old hotel into a place of delightful surprises."

"Very well, come down soon and I'll have it ready. Mr. Redfield, I'm sure, will wait for you."

She flushed with pleasure. "I have done something, but not as I'd like to do. I really think if mother wishes to sell she could do so much to much better advantage."

"I've no doubt of it. Really, I'm not being funny. Miss Wetherford, when I say you've done something heroic, it's no easy thing to go into a place like that and make it habitable. It shows immense courage and self reliance on your part. It's precisely the kind of work this whole country needs."

His praise, sincere and generous, repaid her for all she had gone through. It was a great pleasure to hear her small self praised for courage and self reliance by one whose daily work was heroic. All things conspired to make a conquest of her heart, for the ranger bore himself with grace and dealt with his silver deftly. His face, seen from the side, was older and sterner than she had thought it, but it was very attractive in line.

Redfield appealed to the ranger. "Ross, you're all sorts of a reactionary. What do you say to this? Senator Bridges is opposed to all federal interference with state forests and state game."

The forester's eyes lit up. "But are they state forests and state game? What makes them so? They are lands which the whole people purchased and which the whole people defended."

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary, (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reinforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, pronunciation, have received scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fulness and clearness. The size of vocabulary, its richness of general information, and its convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

ORPINGTON ORIGIN.

For a puzzle to rattle the rooster smart aleck of your town, ask him the why and wherefore of Orpington origin.

It's sure a poultry puzzle, and William Cook of Orpington, England, must have tossed his thinker tired to amalgamate so many different breeds into one, so useful and beautiful, to whose type all its varieties so well conform.

But read the story: The Black, White, Diamond Jubilee, Buff and Silver Spangled Orpingtons made their debut into chicken society in succession, soon became the leaders in England and have gained wonderfully in America by their merits and extensive advertising.

The Blacks came first (1836) and had as first blood black sport pullets from Barred Rocks. These were crossed with a Black Minorca cock, and pullets from this cross were bred to a Black Langshan cock, the last male putting the finish to the type, as is the rule. The Whites result from Black Hamburg hens crossed with a single Comb White Leghorn cock, their pullets bred to a single Comb White Dorking cock. The Buffs are derived from Dark Dorking pullets crossed with Golden Hamburg cock and their dark brown pullets bred to a Buff Rock cock.

The Diamond Jubilee was made by substituting Speckled for Dark Dorking in the above combination and was so called after Queen Victoria's 60th anniversary of her reign.

Silver Spangled Orpingtons are the result of crossing Barred Rock hens with a Dark Dorking cock and breeding their blackest pullets to a Silver Spangled Hamburg cock.

Years were required to bring these varieties to such a perfection that the fifth eye of the Dorking, feather legs of Langshan and cockles and the wile of the Black, White, Diamond Jubilee, Buff and Silver Spangled Orpingtons made their debut into chicken society in succession, soon became the leaders in England and have gained wonderfully in America by their merits and extensive advertising.

Search For Tannin.
The oak is one of the best known natural sources of tannin, although it is found in many other trees. At present the spread of industry has increased the call for tannin to such a degree that search has been made all over the world for some new tree capable of supplementing the oak, hemlock and other trees in furnishing this indispensable substance. A certain degree of success has attended the search in Argentina, where there is found a tree called the quebracho, from which excellent tannin can be obtained. The wood of this tree is very hard and durable, and it grows in large forests.
It has been known as a tannin-producer for twenty years, but only recently has the extraction of the tannin been conducted in Argentina. Formerly the wood itself was exported.

Coloring Copper Black.
A new method of coloring copper, copper alloys and copper plated articles black has been discovered by Dr. Groschuff of Berlin, Germany, which will doubtless be an important in metal work as the blue black every one is familiar with. A caustic soda solution boiled to 212 degrees to which 1 per cent of potassium persulphate is added. In this solution the copper, red brass, red bronze, gun metal, bell metal or whatever the alloy may be is suspended on a wire and, in the case of small articles, is permanently dyed in a few minutes.

A SUBSTANTIAL ROAD OF DIRT

Minols Commission Builds One Without Use of Stone.

CONSTRUCTION METHOD EASY

The Severe Wear Caused by Automobiles Has Made It Necessary to Find Something Stronger Than the Macadam Road—Experiments With Mixture of Dirt and Oil Show Results.

Macadam roads have been the world's standard for many years, but under conditions of modern traffic they have so quickly worn away that in the country which boasted the enduring military roads of Napoleon a campaign of the road engineers of the world was called to discuss means of preventing them from going up in smoke or dust. The iron tire of the horse drawn vehicle rolled and compacted the limestone road. The pneumatic tire of the motorcar sucks up the dust and draws it into the air to blow away. It was formerly compacted by traffic; now it is suction.

This fact has been strikingly demonstrated by the work of the state highway commission of Illinois. One of the best miles of macadam road ever constructed, and surface bound with a gravel of peculiar cementing quality, has been ripped up and blown away down to the large, sharp pointed rocks that constitute the basic course. Other experiments with oil and tar have proved the binding and protecting properties of those substances.

Value of Oil.
The value of oil of heavy asphalt base—the residuum after refining out the volatile oils—as a binder for rock roads led to experiments with it in the construction of dirt roads without the use of stone. The idea was to compact and bind the dirt so that it would be waterproof and as wearproof as possible. In other words, to bind the particles of dirt together so that friction would produce little dust. One of the most striking experiments with oil and dirt was made at Bennett, in Platt county, and herewith we return to our illustrations. The Bennett section ranks among the richest in central Illinois. It is rich because it is fairly bottomless. It was low lying and swampy in the olden days before the coming of the steam dredge and the tile and its roads were as impassable as that type of land affords.

It is usable all the year round for maximum loads. It is practically dustless, it requires no dragging or scraping, and it has a resiliency that saves horse and vehicle and adds much to the comfort of the occupants of wagon or carriage. After more than a year's test, the experiment must be pronounced a great success, and the best men about Bennett, who have made a study of roads for many years, regard it as the solution of the problem of building mudless roads in the black prairie soils.

The method of construction was simple. The mud was plowed six inches deep and the dirt scraped to each side. In the bed thus made a layer of oil was sprinkled, the oil in this experiment being what is usually called 80 to 85 per cent asphalt oil. After the oil was applied two inches of dirt were scraped back into the roadway and oil and soil were thoroughly disked together.

Use of Tamper.
Then followed a tamper, an implement like a large field roller, each section of which bears closely set prongs about ten inches long, somewhat like the spikes attached to the wheels of a steam roller to tear up the road, only longer and rounded on the end. This tamper does the work its name indicates—it completes the mixture and the oil and dirt and tamps it down. After its use more oil and dirt were added until three layers had been applied, and then the steam roller completed the work.

About two and a half gallons of oil were used to the square yard. This oil sells, according to quality, at from 4 to 7 cents per gallon. Taking 5 cents as an average and building a road sixteen feet wide, which is wider than is necessary for the oil, we have a cost for oil of about $1.175 per mile. The labor cost is to be added to that. It is certainly the cheapest mudless road that has yet been devised, as the rock roads run quickly into large numbers when the material must be carried in by rail.

Roads are readily made in this form of road construction. The top is plowed up, more oil added, tamped and rolled, and the surface is as good as new. It is a road that does not need repair. No such road is built. Even the city's granite blocks wear out under the revolving wheels of its heavy traffic. The fundamental fault of a good country road builders is their idea that a road will stay built. It won't. It is not in the nature of things. The best of roads need repair, and who is that? The man who has learned that in road maintenance a stitch in time saves nine. A fortunate man if many of them have learned that fact.

Evidently the black mud roads far from gravel and limestone, need not sit helplessly unimproved in mud. A way out has apparently been found, over a solid, substantial bridge, built of oil and dirt.

SHORT SERMONS ON GOOD ROADS.

No farming section which has once had good roads would ever go back to bad roads.

High freight rates are not nearly as heavy a tax on the shippers of stock and other farm produce as bad roads are.

Only a very rich county could afford the tremendous financial drain of bad roads.

A good road is to a country district what a paved street is to the city property that adjoins it. It makes business for that neighborhood.

A farmer living on a good road is a free man. He is not dependent on weather conditions. He is able to sell his stock and grain and fruit at the best market prices. The railroads have to serve the man who can get his stuff to a shipper point any day in the year.

Money spent for good roads is as good an investment for improving the farm as is money put into stock sheds, grain cribs, fences, seeds or anything else that makes the farm pay.

Brains are as essential as money and muscle in roadmaking.

OILING SHELL ROADS.

The Successful Results of Trials at Houston, Tex.

The application of oil to the shell roads which are more or less common in the south, as well as in some of the northern coast cities, has apparently been tried successfully in Houston, Tex., the mayor stating that the results were so satisfactory that he hoped to be able to treat all the shelled streets in that city in the same manner.

The material used was an asphaltic oil which was heated to something over 200 degrees before application. It was shipped in tank cars fitted with steam coils, by means of which it was heated by a portable boiler and allowed to run into distributing wagons. The roads were first cleaned of all dust and the oil applied at the rate of about one gallon a square yard.

The street was allowed to soak up as much of the oil as possible, the surplus being absorbed by sand or dust spread over the street and then swept off, exposing the original surface.

THE RESULT.

PROFIT IN BREEDING GOOD BIG HORSES.

In breeding horses sound parents are necessary for the production of sound offspring. Soundness in one parent should not be trusted to eliminate unsoundness in the other, says the Kansas Farmer. One or both may have beauty of form, and the resultant progeny may likewise be beautiful, but more beauty is of little value unless associated with soundness and good wearing qualities. That "like produces like" is the well known law in breeding. The use of unsound stallions and mares in breeding operations, whether for the market or for farm stock, will produce unsound horses to offer on the market for the small, disheartening prices paid for such animals or with the equally unsatisfactory result of raising horses that are hardly worth their keep.

An unsound stallion, no matter how handsome in conformation, how well he may be bred, or how many prizes he may have won, should be overlooked positively by the owner of a good mare. Transmissible diseases in stallions will develop in the offspring. The stud requires in the main are sound eyes, healthy and wind. Spavins, sidelones, elandones, stringhalt, St. Vitus dance (chorea) and contagious diseases must be religiously guarded against. A certificate of soundness signed by a qualified and reputable veterinarian would not be more than a reasonable demand from the breeder. This, however, is but one side of the matter. The mare must also be sound. Among other things, a worn out, injured, blind, halt or otherwise unsound mare, no matter how good she has been, is not fit for breeding purposes, on the basis that "she is good for nothing else." This policy is not only absurd, but costly.

The draft horse is far excellent the horse for the farmer to raise. Only the blood of the best draft breeds and the heaviest and best boned stallions are suitable. Even then the demand for extreme weights necessitates the use of large mares that are good milkers. In no other way can colts be produced with sufficient bone and feeding quality to attain the size and finish demanded by the market. Even then, as before stated, the youngsters must be supplied with the best of feed in large amounts from the very first. Only the best blood must be used, and then every effort must be made to keep the horse gaining from the first if he is to top the market.

be brought more strikingly before the people of Nebraska a demonstration was arranged for at the Union stockyards at South Omaha in co-operation with the Union Stockyards company of Omaha.

The stockyards company purchased thirty pigs, weighing from forty to sixty pounds each, from a farm which had been free from hog cholera for several years. These pigs were brought to the stockyards, and on July 23, 1910, four of them were injected with blood from hogs sick of hog cholera. These inoculated pigs were placed in a pen by themselves, and within five days they had become sick, at which time eighteen of the remaining pigs were each given one dose of the serum, while the other eight pigs were not treated in any way. The eighteen serum treated pigs and the eight untreated pigs were then placed in the same pen with the four pigs which had been made sick by inoculation.

The four pigs which were first given hog cholera all died, and the eight untreated pigs all contracted the disease from them. The eighteen pigs which were given serum and which were confined in the same pen with the four original sick pigs and which the sick untreated pigs remained perfectly well and were finally turned over to the officials of the stockyards company upon the completion of the experiment, Sept. 17, 1910.

The experiment was witnessed by representatives of the Nebraska agricultural experiment station and of the Nebraska Swine Breeders' association as well as by representatives of agricultural papers published in Nebraska. The department of agriculture does not distribute this serum to farmers, but is endeavoring to bring the value of this method to the attention of the stock raising interests in order that they may arrange to secure state funds for the manufacture and distribution of the serum. The government authorities consider that this new serum treatment if properly applied will result in the saving of millions of dollars.

Preparing For Winter.

It is a good time now to get ready for next year's corn crop. Saving good seed is laying the first stone to the wall of success.

Take the best ears—not necessarily the largest, although those are to be desired if they are perfect. A clean, firm, well shaped ear, with rows all as straight as a knitting needle and tipped out nicely, will fill the bill.

Still another fall job is to line up the new buildings we have under way or fix up the old ones the best we can for winter. We can always do this better and get more comfort out of it if we are not crowded by cold winds and the thought that winter is right at our heels.

See to it also that the calves and young stock are getting to be in good trim for the long cold weather just ahead. They will grow faster now on the same amount of feed than they will later after the cold begins to pinch pretty hard. Then flesh and bone cost quite a good deal more.

Thymol and Stomach Worms in Sheep.

Some time ago Joseph E. Wing suggested thymol, a drug that is used extensively and successfully in treating human subjects for hookworms, as a possible remedy for stomach worms in sheep, writes N. S. Mayo in the Breeder's Gazette. The same thought had occurred to him, and preparations had been made to test it, but a satisfactory opportunity did not occur until recently.

The feces of a lamb were examined and eggs of the stomach worm found. The lamb was given a purge of salts, followed by the thymol in gelatin capsules. Following the thymol another purge of salts was given. Doses of nine to fifteen grains were given, but without results. Following the thymol treatment the same lamb was given a dose of gasoline, that caused many stomach worms to be expelled in the feces. From this limited trial it does not appear to be a satisfactory treatment for stomach worms in lambs.

Charcoal For Cows.

Do not suppose the cow's appetite. She knows what it takes to make a balanced ration better than any feeding standard. If she does not like bran and corn give oats and corn. If she is tired of fodder by all means try a little clover hay. A mixture of salt, two parts, and ashes, one part, should be put in the salting box at least once each week. The ashes should be rich in charcoal. The cows require a great deal of charcoal and cannot do their best without it.

Roots For Cattle.

Raw radishes makes an excellent feed for cattle, but it cannot be safely fed to horses. Mangels, carrots, beets and turnips will, however, be found good for both horses and cattle if fed raw. They are named here in order of their value.

How to Clean Bottles.
To clean water jars or small neck bottles fill with one heaped level small piece. Put in jar and fill with cold water and let stand a few hours or overnight. They will be perfectly clean when rinsed and reused.

How to Mend a Sweater.
To mend a hole in a sweater place yarn as for darning and start from the top and chain stitch to bottom with darning needle catching each "loop" as you go down. You will have a neat job, and no one will notice it.

"Heh, heh," cheered Enderby. Bridges bristled with anger and went off into a long harangue on state rights and the dangers of centralization, to which Enderby replied: "Bosh! The whole trouble with your lily government is its lack of cohesion. If I had my way I'd wipe out the senate. You're such blooming asses over here. You don't know enough to keep a really big man in your presidential chair. This fussing about every four years is plain rot. Here's Roosevelt sets in the midst of a lot of the finest kind of reforms, you know, and directly you go and turn him out. Then if you get a bad man you're to wait four years till you can fetch him a whack. Why not arrange it so you can pitch your president out the minute he goes wrong? I say your old razz of a constitution is a ball and chain on your national leg. England is immeasurably better off so far as that goes."

Ross turned to Virginia, leaving the political discussion to go on over his head. "I was back in the old island a couple of years ago, and you've no idea how small it seemed to me. It surely is a 'right little, tight little island.' I couldn't help wondering whether the men in parliament were as important as they seemed to think they were and whether England is not really an empty shell of empire, a memory of what it once was. I couldn't settle down there some way. I was homesick for the mountains in a month. But what scared me most was the pauper population of the old place—one in every thirty-seven must be helped. I came back to the States gladly. 'I guess I'm an American,' I said to my sisters."

To Lee Virginia the talk of "the curse of democracy" and "the decay of empire" was unexciting, but when Cavanagh told of the sheepmen's advance across the dend line on Deer creek and of the threats of the cattle owners she was better able to follow the discussion. Bridges was heartily on the side of law and order, for he wished to boom the state being a heavy owner in a town after, but he objected to Redfield's ideas of "botting up the resources of the state."

"But we're not," retorted Redfield; "we're merely defending them against those who would monopolize them. We believe in their fullest use, but we see no reason for giving away the resources when the country needs the revenue."

Mrs. Redfield rose as soon as the coffee came on. "You gentlemen seem bent upon discussing matters of no interest to us," she said, "so we'll leave you to fight it out alone. I'm sure you'll all agree with Hugh in the end. Like General Grant, he's a very obstinate man."

No sooner were they seated in the big living room than Mrs. Enderby began to relate comical stories of her household. Her cuts had its end and ran up the wall. Her dogs were forever getting quilled by reason of foolish attacks upon porcupines, or else they came home so reminiscent of skunks that they all but smothered the cook. "Invariably they return from encounters of this kind just as we are sitting at dinner," she explained. "Furthermore, Enderby's children are habitually getting elegant and overlooking the laws, and filling the cellar, and he stands in terror of his cowboys. When I think of all these irruptions and distractions Enderby's order and routine seem heavenly. But Charley finds all this amusing, more's the pity, and leaves me to get things in order. Most ludicrous of all to me is his habitual claim that the ranch is paying. I tell him there's an error in his bookkeeping somewhere, but he assures me that his receipts exceed his expenditures last year, which is quite too incredible. You've no idea how high wages are and how little we make."

"Oh, yes, I have," laughed Mrs. Redfield. "And my cat had a fit too. Hugh says it's the high altitude. I tell him it's melancholia."

Cavanagh showed himself. "I hear so much laughter—I'm coming in. We're all so insufferably political out here, and, besides, I came to see the ladies, and I can stay only a few minutes longer."

"You're not going back tonight?" exclaimed his hostess.

"I must be on my own property by daylight," he replied. "The supervisor has my eye on me."

Mrs. Redfield explained to Lee Virginia, "He rode fifty miles over the mountains."

"Thirty," corrected Ross. "But what does that matter when I'm in the company of such charming ladies?" he added gallantly.

"And now he's going to ride all the way back tonight,"

"Think of that," gasped Mrs. Enderby. "And no moon!"

"How can you find your way?" asked Mrs. Bridges, to whom this was a mortally dangerous journey.

"Oh, it's quite simple! If you don't bump against a tree or fall into the creek you may be quite sure you're on the trail," laughed Ross.

Mrs. Redfield knew the true reason for his coming and was not at all pleased, "for, with all Lee's personal charm," she said to her husband, "she is socially beneath Ross Cavanagh even in a state where social barriers are few."

"Come out on the veranda," suggested Cavanagh. "And I'll show you the hills I must climb."

Lee accepted innocently, but as the young people left the room Mrs. Enderby looked at her hostess with significant glance. "There's the lady Ross rode down to meet. Who is she?"

"Her mother is that dreadful old creature that keeps the Wetherford hotel in Redding Fork."

"No," exclaimed Mrs. Enderby. "Yes, Lee Virginia is Lee Wetherford's daughter."

"But the girl is charming."

"I cannot understand it. Hugh came home a week or so ago full of her praise. And at this point her voice dropped lower, and the other drew closer."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE CASE OF LEE VIRGINIA AND ROSS.

LEE and Ross stood in silence on the Redfield veranda. There was no moon, and the mountains rose darkly, a sheer wall at the end of the garden, their tops cutting into the starry sky with a dull edge, over which a dim white cone peered.

"That snow peak is Wolftooth and thirty miles from here and at the head of my 'heat,'" said the ranger after a pause as they leaned against the railing and looked away to the south. "I go up that ridge which you see faintly at the left of the main canyon and through that deep notch which is above timber line."

The girl's eyes widened with awe of the big, silent, dark world he indicated. "Aren't you afraid to start out on such a trip alone—I mean, don't you dread it?"

"I'll be sorry to start back, yes, but not because of the dark. I've enjoyed my visit here so much it will be hard to say good night."

"It seems strange to me that you should prefer this wild country to England."

"Do you like the east better than the west?"

"In some ways; but, then, you see, I was born out here."

"So was I—I mean to say I was regenerated out here. The truth is I was a good deal of a scapegrace when I left England. I was always for hunting and horses, and naturally I came directly to the wild west-country, and here I've been ever since. I've had my turn at each phase of it—cowpuncher, soldier, rough rider and finally forest ranger. I reckon I've found my job at last."

"Do you like it so much?"

"At the present time I am perfectly contented. I'm associated now with a country that will never yield to the plow. Yes, I like my work. I love the forests and the streams. I wish I might show them to you. You don't know how beautiful they are. The most beautiful parks in the world are commonplace to what I can show you. My only sorrow is to think of them given over to the sawmill. Perhaps you and your mother will come up some time and let me show you my lakes and streams. There are waters so lovely they make the heart ache. Hugh is planning to come up soon; perhaps you and Mrs. Redfield will come with him."

"I'd like it above everything," she responded fervently. Then her voice changed. "But all depends on my mother's health."

It hurt him to hear her call Ella Wetherford mother. He wanted to forget her birth for the moment. He was not in love with her—far from it! But she was so alluring, and the proprietress of the Wetherford House was not nice, and that made one doubt the daughter.

She broke the silence. "It seems dreadfully dark and mysterious up there," she indicated his path.

"It isn't as bad as it looks. There is a good trail, and my pony knows it as well as I do. I enjoy riding by night."

"But there are bears and other wild things are there now?"

"Not as much as I wish there were."

"Why do you say that?"

"I hate to see all the wild life killed off. Some day all these forests will have game refuges like the Yellowstone National park. They are coming each year to have greater and greater value to the people of the plains. They are playgrounds, like the Alps. I should ever settle down to a home it would be in a canyon like this, with a great peak at my front door."

"It is beautiful," the girl said in the tone of sadness with which we confront the perfect night, the perfect flower, the lawless landscape. "It is both grand and peaceful."

This tone of sadness pleased him. It showed her depth of perception, and he reflected that she had not uttered a vulgar or silly phrase since their first meeting. "She is capable of great development," he thought. Aloud he said, "You're a strange mingling of east and west. Do you realize it?"

"In what way?" she asked, feeling something ardent in his tone.

"You typify to me at this moment this whole state. You fill me with enthusiasm for its future. Here you are, derived from the lawless west, yet taking on the culture and restraint of the east so readily that you seem not in the least related to."

He checked himself at this point, and she said, "My mother is not as rough as she seems, Mr. Cavanagh."

"She must be more of the woman than appears or she could not have borne such a daughter. What do you feel your relationship to her? Tell me honestly, for you interest me."

"I didn't at first, but I do now. I begin to understand her, and, besides, I feel in myself certain things that are in her, though I think I am more like the Wetherfords. My father's family home was in Maryland."

Ross could have talked on all night, so alluring was the girl's dimly seen yet warmly felt figure at his side, but a sense of dumber and a knowledge that he should be riding led him at last to say, "It is getting chilly. We must go in, but before we do so let me say how much I've enjoyed seeing you again. I hope the doctor will make favorable report on your mother's case. You'll write me the result of the examination, won't you?"

"If you wish me to."

"I shall be most anxious to know." They were standing very near to each other at the moment, and the ranger, made very sensitive to woman's charm by his lonely life, shook with newly created love of her. A suspicion, a hope, that beneath her cultivated manner lay the passionate nature of her mother gave an added force to his desire. He was sorely tempted to touch her, to test her, but her sweet voice, a little sad and perfectly unconscious of evil, calmed him. She said:

"I hope to persuade my mother to leave the Forks. All the best people there are against us. Some of them have been very cruel to her and to me. And, besides, I despise and fear the men who come to our table."

"You must not exchange words with them," he all but commanded. "Be aware of Gregg; he is a vile lot. Do not trust him for an instant. Do not permit any of those loafers to talk with you, for if you do they will go away to defame you. I know them. They are unspeakably vile. It makes me angry to think that Gregg and his like have the right to speak to you every day, while I can see you only at long intervals. I wish my station were not so far away. But I'll ride down as often as my duties will permit, and you must let me know how things go. And if any of those fellows persecute you you'll tell me, won't you? I wish you'd look upon me as your big brother. Will you do that?" His voice entreated, and as she remained silent he continued: "Boaring Fork is one of the worst towns in the state, and a girl like you needs some one as a protector. I don't know just how to put it so that you will not misunderstand me, but, you see, I protect the forest, the streams and the game. I help the settler in time of trouble. I am a kind of all round big brother to everybody who needs help in the forest. In fact, I'm paid for protecting things that can't protect themselves, and so—here he tried to lend his voice the accent of humor—"why shouldn't I be the protector of a girl like you, alone—worse than alone—in this little town?"

She remained dumb at one or two points where he clearly hoped for a word, and she was unable to thank him when he had finished. In this silence a curious constriction came into his throat. It was almost as if he had put his passion into definite words, and as the light fell upon her he perceived that her bosom was heaving with deep emotion.

"I am lonely," she faltered out at last—"horribly lonely. And I know how now people feel toward my mother, and it hurts me—it all hurts me. But I'm going to stay and help her."

She paused to recover her voice. "And you do seem different. I—I trust you!" "I'm glad you understand me, and you will let me know if I can help you, won't you?"

"Yes," she answered simply. "Good night," he said, extending his hand.

She placed her palm to his quite frankly, but the touch of it made further speech at the moment impossible. They went in with such telltale faces that even Redfield wondered what had passed between them.

Extending himself almost at once, Cavanagh left the room, and when he looked in a few moments later he was clothed in the ranger's dusty green uniform, booted and spurred for his long, hard ride. Mrs. Redfield followed him into the hall and out on the doorsteps to say: "Ross, you must be careful. This girl is very alluring in herself, but her mother, you know, is impossible."

"You're awfully alarmed, as usual," he smilingly replied. "She interests me, that's certain. But beyond that, why, nonsense. Good night."

Nevertheless, despite his protestations, he went away on the trail with his mind so filled with Lee Virginia's appealing face and form that he would certainly have ridden over a precipice had it not been for his experienced pony, which had fortunately but one aim, and that was to cross the range safely and to reach the home pasture at the earliest moment.

Left alone, Lee Virginia thought over her past. She was not entirely without experience as regards respectful courtship. Her life in the east had brought her to know a number of attractive lads and a few men, but none of these had become more than a good companion or friend, and though she wrote to one or two of these youths letters of the most friendliness, there was no passion in them, and she felt as yet the sting of nothing more intense in her thinking for Cavanagh. But he meant more to her now than she was lonely and beguiled.

That he had ridden all that long, rough way merely to see her she was not vain enough to believe, but she had nevertheless something of every woman's secret belief in her individual charm. Cavanagh had shown a flattering interest in her, and his wish to be her protector filled her with joy and confidence.

THEATRICAL

Theatre patrons who were fortunate enough to witness a performance of "Paid in Full" when that wonderful write and absorbing drama of life in New York was presented in the city to whose mode of living it held up such a truthful mirror, need not be told that it is one of those remarkable dramas that are seen only once every decade or so.

Its author, Eugene Walter, is undoubtedly one of the foremost students of dramatic literature in the country today and nothing that he has written surpasses "Paid in Full" in the fidelity with which it paints its story.

It is like the canvas of a master artist, the brush strokes are vigorous, and the story is brought out in a series of climaxes and clever dialogue that make it appear to almost play itself.

The theme of the drama deals with the efforts of a young man, married to a woman who is ambitious, and who is himself working for a very modest salary. To gratify the desires and ambitions of his wife, the principal male character resorts to stealing and other vices. The story moves on to a finale that is totally unexpected and at the same time, the most reasonable premise possible to imagine. It is announced for a special appearance of one night, in this city, at the Opera House on tomorrow night, Thursday. Seats are now selling at Chapin's Drug Store.

"Checkmate" is a laugh throughout and is composed of many good musical numbers. The plot of the play deals with a rich Baron and his cousin, who fell heir to their uncle's estate, wherein his will states his wish that the cousins be married. Toffey, fearing his cousin wishes to marry him for his title, joins her to the test by exchanging positions of life with his groom. Miss Russe fears Toffey will only want to marry her for her money, so she changes positions with her maid. Throughout the entire play the situations are extremely funny.

"Checkmate" will be produced for the first time in Northern Michigan and will have company of twenty-four people. A large chorus will be seen and plenty of chorus steps be worked out. This musical comedy is produced for the benefit of The City Band Friday evening, February 21, at the Charlevoix theatre under the direction of Leon F. Brower. The band will turn out on the afternoon of the show, if the weather permits. Seats will be on sale at Chapin's on Thursday of next week.

At the Majestic.

The Majestic opened Monday night with the All-star Vandeville Co. Their program consists of the following artists: LaFrance & Everett, Virginia Rhineland, Everett & Brock, New York Comedy Quartet. The performers change their toll tonight, Friday and Saturday, playing a matinee on Saturday at 2:30. The pictures shown are of the latest and do credit to this popular play-house.

Sore Mouth of Cow.

Swab the sore mouth and tongue once or twice daily with a solution of half an ounce each of powdered alum and borax in a quart of water. If the tongue is enlarged, hard and showing denuded or striped places it is netionomycolis of the tongue (wooden tongue), and this is best treated by painting sores with tincture of iodine every other day and giving a dram of iodide of potash in water night and morning for periods of ten days with two weeks' intermission.

LECTURE ON FARMING

New York Man Will Talk to Foreigners on Advantages in Michigan.

Louis Roth, an attorney of Tompkinsville, N. Y., has written to the development bureau stating that he has accepted an invitation of the board of education of that city to deliver a series of lectures upon the subject of farming to the foreigners located in the city, and asks that suitable photographs of farm scenes in western Michigan be sent him for use with a stereoscope. Mr. Roth spent a year in Michigan and will take the state as the one best adapted to the purposes of general agriculture.

The Bureau has shipped him a complete set of photographs of scenes taken in this region which will be suitable for the work which he has in hand. This request is another proof that the fame of western Michigan as an ideal farming community is spreading to the remotest part of the country, and the people are taking notice that the very best opportunities are held by Michigan for the people in the overcrowded cities of the east and middle west.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Mercury.

Mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering through the mucous surface. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Halls Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Halls Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free. Sold by Druggists. Price, 75c per bottle. Origin of Polled Jerseys.

It is said that the first Polled Jersey, Daisy L., was taken as a calf from Lelands, N. H., to Newark, O. She was the granddaughter of a polled cow, said to have been imported from the island of Jersey by Professor Thaddeus. Called "Yellow" a horned bull, this cow produced a daughter named Jere, an animal with small horns, which, from a horned Jersey bull, brought forth Daisy. This variety first attracted attention in 1861, when a Polled Jersey, Nubbin Bldce Queen XXXVII, proved at the Pan-American to be the richest milkier of the fifty cows of the ten breeds represented.—Country Gentleman.

Hon. H. L. Iddings Dropped Dead Tuesday.

WAS FIRST MAYOR OF CHARLEVOIX

Took an Active Part in All Municipal Affairs

Was Prominent Merchant—Member of Masonic Orders and Macabre—Graduate of Albion College.

Tuesday noon Charlevoix citizens were shocked on hearing that Hon. H. L. Iddings, one of our most prominent citizens, had dropped dead in Block Bros. store, as Mr. Iddings was always a type of vigorous, healthy manhood.

Tuesday noon was his custom. Mr. Iddings went to Block Bros. to purchase some supplies for dinner, and had just picked out some oranges when he suddenly fell forward, Joseph Gann, with whom he had been talking the moment before, had just started to leave the store when he heard him fall, and at once picked him up, but he had ceased to breathe.

Harvey Lee Iddings was born in Oxford, Ohio, November 10, 1850, and was the son of Rev. Joseph Talbot and Martha Ann Iddings. He received his education in the public schools and was a graduate of Albion college. About twenty-six years ago he came to this city and entered into the hardware business with M. J. Stockman, a partnership which continued several years after which Mr. Iddings conducted the business under the name of the Charlevoix Hardware Co.

Mr. Iddings always took an active part in public affairs, and, while a strong Republican in politics, speaking often in behalf of his party in national and state campaigns, was a believer in non-partisanship in municipal affairs and was often called upon to serve the people in an official capacity, as supervisor of the township, and member of the village board. He was the first mayor of Charlevoix and had served several terms on the board of education of which he was president at the time of his death.

Mr. Iddings has long been recognized as the best impromptu speaker in Charlevoix and was always called upon to speak at banquets and gatherings of that nature where his listeners were always sure to hear something good.

He was a member of the Methodist church and of the different branches of the Masonic order in which he took an active interest, as well as the Macabres, with whom he carried $2,000 insurance. A man of strong personality, no man will be more missed in our city than H. L. Iddings.

He was married in Albion, Michigan to Miss Nellie Gale, who, with three daughters, Dorothy and Constance, who are attending college, and Miss Horatio at home, survive also a sister, Mrs. H. T. Thomson, whose husband is a United States army surgeon, stationed at Washington, a niece, Miss Gale, formerly a teacher in the public schools of this city, but now of Washington, a niece in Prescott, Arizona and a nephew who is attending the Pennsylvania Military College.

The funeral was held at the home this afternoon and the body will be taken to his old home in Albion for burial.

TO MANAGE BEULAH HOME

Charles A. Jones, Popular Railroad Conductor to Enter New Field.

The following article published in the Petoskey News, will be of interest to the friends of Charles Jones, the popular Pere Marquette conductor, who is well known in Charlevoix.

Charles A. Jones, the only, and the real popular conductor on the Pere Marquette has branched out, and in addition to his daily stint at punching tickets and tossing coin at the emergency air brake rope, will make his name famous, as the new manager of the Beulah home which he has recently purchased and of which he will assume active management, though of course at long range. When interviewed Monday morning by an Evening News reporter, Mr. Jones confirmed the rumor and declared that he meant to run it, too. The many friends of Mr. Jones, though a trifle surprised at the announcement, will nevertheless be heartily glad, and wish him unbounded success, which those who know his limitless energy and ambition will readily accord him. It has not been learned at just what date Mr. Jones will take possession.

STEAMER BEAVER AND CAPTAIN

Sure Combination Against the Ugliest Moods

OF LAKE MICHIGAN'S ANGRY WATERS

Article by Special Writer to Grand Rapids Press

Captain Campbell has been at Helm Ever Since Regular Mail Service was inaugurated on the Route.

In the little Beaver, which has the government contract to carry mails to the Beaver islands, Charlevoix may boast of one of the sturdiest of Lake Michigan's so-called mosquito fleets.

It is nothing uncommon to see the little 100-foot Beaver bravely poke its prow out through the main street draw and start right in to buck the old lake's surges when some of the big steamers are tied up at their docks awaiting more favorable weather. But Capt. P. D. Campbell and the Beaver are about as sure a combination to play against Lake Michigan's ugliest moods as any small craft that plies the waters. Campbell commanded the first steamer ever to make regular trips to the island and he has been at the helm constantly during all the years since the government mail service was inaugurated on this route. Naturally he knows the course and the currents.

He requires no foghorn to tell him the way in thick weather. They say in Charlevoix that he can smell his way from the island right to the mouth of the channel and that he doubtless could bring the Beaver right up to the bridge with his eyes blindfolded. You see, Capt. Campbell's long association with the Beaver coupled with his perfect knowledge of conditions upon the route he makes almost daily, contributes a factor of safety on this tempestuous little strip of water that no other ship of equal size or commander could guarantee.

The Beaver is built for tough service. Its lower deck is enclosed clear up to within a few feet of the stern and the rigging of the upper deck forward is made water tight. There is absolutely nothing upon which a breaking sea can take hold. The little steamer is very buoyant, rides high and has a world of power for its tonnage. All these features combine to make it an ideal seaboat and one upon which a commander who knows the water may depend upon under the most trying conditions.

The route taken by the Beaver includes some of the roughest water in Lake Michigan. It has been said to be a portion of the lake that coincides more with the kind of sea kicked up on the notorious Lake Erie than any other stretch in the great lakes. This is due probably to the comparatively shoal water. The gales from north, west and southwest get a clear sweep and can

ONLY ASKS PROMOTION

Elisha N. Clink Candidate for Nomination for Circuit Judge.

Elisha N. Clink of East Jordan, candidate for the republican nomination for circuit judge, needs no introduction to the people of Charlevoix county. For years he has lived and worked among them. He has served them as a public official retiring at the end of one term on account of his large private practice. He feels now that he has earned the right to ask you to promote him to a higher position. His opponent has served in an official capacity for the past twenty years and now asks the people to give him six years more. Would he not at that time ask for six years more, with as strong claims, as he has now in asking for your vote this spring? Do you believe in life tenure in office or do you believe in the American system of promotion? What ambition can an attorney have to advance in his profession if the hope of reaching the bench is denied him until he has passed the age when he can give his best service? Think over these questions carefully before you vote next Wednesday.

Mr. Clink as a Republican has worked for the best interests of the party in every campaign. He is not a stand-patter but has been from the start a believer in progressive measures. He believes firmly in the right of the people to govern themselves and when his opponent was expressing his disapproval of direct nominations and advocating the old discredited convention system was found on the side of the people. If your verdict is against him next Wednesday, he will be found upholding the choice of the people's right, but he does ask that you turn out to the polls and cast a large vote, so there can be no question or doubt that the verdict rendered is indeed the will of the Republicans of the thirtieth judicial circuit.

Owners of automobiles will be obliged to take out new licenses for 1912 and the secretary of state advises that they be taken out as soon as possible. All machines must have new numbers. The new plates have enamel backgrounds and white letters, the arrangement being the opposite of the plate used during the year 1911. Home-made plates are not allowed. Drivers of motor vehicles must take out a license, as well as owners. A chauffeur must pay a fee of $2 to the secretary of state, and in return will receive a badge, which the law requires to be worn in a conspicuous place upon his person. In making application for a license, the applicant must tell how many times he has been convicted for violating any auto law. No person can drive an automobile unless he is the owner of a regular licensed driver badge. To be such he must be at least 18 years of age. Members of the owner's family have no right to drive the machine unless they are regularly licensed.

SHAKESPEARE STUDY CLUB BANQUET

Fifth Annual Held at Baker's Inn Friday Night

WAS MOST BRILLIANT SOCIAL EVENT

Mrs. R. B. Armstrong Officiated as Toast Mistress

Debated Question, Resolved That Bacon and Not Shakespeare Wrote the Shakespeare Plays.

The fifth annual banquet of the Shakespeare Study Club was held at Baker's Inn on Friday evening Feb. 17. At 7:45 the ladies of the club and their husbands entered the dining room to a march rendered by the Shakespeare orchestra. The long table was beautifully decorated with flowers and greens and a large bust of Shakespeare in the center.

After a bouillabaisse and delicious repast the president, Mrs. A. A. Swinton, arose and in her gracious and pleasing manner, welcomed the guests of the evening and introduced the toast-mistress, Mrs. R. B. Armstrong. As toast-mistress Mrs. Armstrong was exceedingly bright and clever.

In a poetic strain Mrs. R. W. Paddock gave the toast to the guests of the evening, the gentlemen. This was full of wit and good fellowship and received hearty applause.

The next on the program was a debate, "Resolved that Shakespeare and not Bacon wrote Shakespeare's works." The affirmative was taken by Mrs. E. W. Mayne, and the ladies of the club felt they were amply represented by Mrs. Mayne's thorough understanding of the subject she handled. Her arguments were most convincing.

On the Bacon side, Mr. Hampton argued most ably in a brilliant original speech, showing complete knowledge of his subject. This debate is something the club may well be proud of.

Following this was a song, "To Shakespeare" sung by the members of the Shakespeare Orchestra. This received several encores and delighted all the hearers. Miss Nina Mayne then recited Kipling's "Fuzzy Wuzzy," and was recalled with great enthusiasm and as an encore gave most charmingly, "A Boys' Love Story."

Mr. Fitch then toasted the ladies of the club in his clear and forceful way, leaving no doubt in anyone's mind that "she outstrips all praise and makes it half behind her." The toast-mistress then asked all to rise and join with her in a toast to each and all and to the absent members of the club.

This closed the program of one of the most successful events of the year.

Give somebody else a chance. Vote for Clink. 811

LETTER FROM CAPTAIN WEAVER

Tells of Rebuilding of Steamer Lou A. Cummings

WRITTEN TO BOYNE CITY JOURNAL

Will be Lengthened Over Eleven Feet

Speed Will be Increased Considerable—May be Re-named "City of Boyne"—Will be Practically New Boat

A short time ago we published an article calling attention to the fact that the steamer Lou A. Cummings was undergoing extensive repairs and that it was the intention to have her name changed. We also suggested that our business men petition the owners of the boat to have it named "The City of Boyne."

Saturday we received a letter from Capt. George Weaver who is in Marquette overseeing the repairs that are being made on the steamer but it came too late for publication. We give the letter in full today and the Journal extends thanks to the Captain for his assurance of good will to our city and will promise him and his boat a rousing reception here on their first trip if they come in flying "The City of Boyne" at the mast head. Marquette, Feb. 10, 1911.

Editor Evening Journal: Boyne City.

Dear Editor: I have been here all winter looking after the work being done on the steamer Cummings and the Journal is forwarded to me from home occasionally. I find in your issue of the 3rd quite an article in regard to the repairs being made on the Cummings, also where you think the business men of your city should petition the owners to change her name to the "City of Boyne City." I bring one of the owners, thank you very much for taking that interest in the boat, but will say this, that a petition will not be necessary, for if the name can be changed, I will cheerfully honor your city by calling her either "Boyne City" or "City of Boyne," and there is no question but my partners will back me up in my assertion. Changing the name of a big boat is a thing that can't be done very easily, but I will go right after it, and if it is a possible thing, will be flying a banner 12 feet long with "City of Boyne" in the center, on my first trip on Pine Lake.

When the boat leaves the ship yard here she will be practically a new hull, as I am putting in new frames from stern to stern, new ceiling, clamps and shell, and nearly all new planking outside. In addition to this, she is lengthened eleven and one-half feet, new hull, fire box type, 6x12, with a steam pressure of 110 pounds, new cylinder 17x16. Every part of the boat is getting all the necessary repairs to make her first class in every respect. I can't say at this time just what her speed will be, but I think the additional length and increased power and much better water line will increase her speed considerably. Best wishes to all my friends. Yours truly, Capt. George Weaver.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

"She heard a good deal more about this particular forest ranger next morning at breakfast. 'He is throwing himself away,' Mrs. Redfield passionately declared. 'Think of a man of Ross' refinement living in a mountain shack miles from anybody, watching poachers, marking trees and cooking his own food! It's a shameful waste of genius.'

"That's as you look at it, my dear," responded Redfield. "Ross is the guardian of an immense treasure chest which belongs to the nation. Furthermore, he is quite certain, as I am, that this forest service is the policy of the future and that it offers fine chances for promotion, and then, finally, he likes it."

THE TOUCH OF IT MADE FURTHER SPEECH IMPOSSIBLE.

"That is all well enough for a young man, but Ross is at least thirty-five and should be thinking of settling down. I can't understand his point of view."

"My dear, you have never seen the procession of the seasons from such a point of view as that which he enjoys."

"No, and I do not care to. It is quite lonely enough for me right here."

Redfield looked at Lee with comic blankness. "Mrs. Redfield is hopelessly urban. As the wife of a forest supervisor she cares more for pavements and tramcars than for the most splendid mountain park."

"I most certainly do," his wife vigorously agreed, "and if I had my way we should be living in London."

"Listen to that! She's ten times more English than Mrs. Enderby."

"I'm not, but I long for the civilized instead of the wild. I like comfort and society."

"So do I," returned he.

"Yes; the comfort of an easy chair on the porch and the society of your forest rangers. This ranch life is all very well for a summer outing, but to be tied down here all the year round is to be denied one's birthright as a modern."

All this more or less cheerful complaint expressed the minds of many others who live amid these superior scenes. When autumn comes, when the sky is gray and the peaks are hid in mist, they long for the music, the lights, the comfort of the city. But when the April sun begins to go down in a smother of crimson and flame and the mountains loom with epic dignity, or when at dawn the air is like some divine flood descending from the unstarred mysterious heights, then the dweller in the foothills cries out:

"How fortunate we are! Here are health and happiness! Here poverty is unknown!"

Mrs. Redfield was becoming more and more interested in Virginia, who had not merely the unassuming reputation of her mother to contend with, but the memory of a traitorous sire to live down, and when the girl went to her room to pack her bag the wife turned to her husband and said:

"Ross is terribly smitten with her."

Redfield coughed ineffectually. "I hope not. Of course he admires her, as any man must. She's physically attractive, very attractive, and besides, Ross is as susceptible as a computer."

He was deeply impressed the first time he saw her; I could see that."

"I didn't like his going out on the veranda with her last night," continued Mrs. Redfield, "and when they came in her eyes and color indicated that he'd been saying something exciting to her. Hugh, Ross Cavanagh must not get involved with that girl. It's your duty as his superior to warn him."

"He's fully grown, my dear, and a bit dictatorial on his own part. I'm a little thing about cutting in on his private affairs."

"Perhaps we've been unjust to Lize all along," suggested Redfield. "She has remained faithful to 124 Wetherford's memory all these years—that is conceded. Doesn't that argue some unusual quality? How many women do we know who are capable of such loyalty? Come, now, Lize is a rough piece of goods, I'll admit, and her lunch counter was a public nuisance, but she had the courage to send her girl away to be educated, denying herself the joy of seeing her develop by her side. We mustn't permit our prejudices to run away with us."

The girl's return put a stop to the discussion, which could end in nothing but confusion anyway.

CHAPTER IX.

THE DOCTOR SEES LIZE.

LEE VIRGINIA said goodbye to Mrs. Redfield with grateful appreciation of her kindness, and especially of her invitation to come again, and the tears in her eyes profoundly affected the older woman, who, with a friendliness which was something more than politeness, invited her to come again. "Whenever Roubing Fork gets on your nerves we'll be very glad to rescue you," she said in parting.

Redfield the girl thoroughly understood and loved, he was so simple hearted and so loyal. On the way to the office he said to Lee, "I will talk to the doctor if you like."

"I wish you would," she responded fervently.

She remained in the machine while he went in, and as she sat there a train passed on its downward eastward run, and a feeling of loneliness, of helplessness, filled her heart. Now that she was within sight of the railway the call of the east, the temptation to escape all her discomforts, was almost great enough to carry her away, but into her mind came the thought of the ranger riding his solitary way, and she turned her face to her own duties once more, comforted by the words of praise he had spoken and by the blaze of admiration in his eyes.

Redfield came out, followed by a small man carrying a neat bag.

"You'd better sit behind, doctor," said Redfield. "I shall be very busy on this trip."

"Very well," replied the other. "If Miss Wetherford remains beside me, otherwise I shall rebel."

He began by asking a few questions about her mother's way of life, but as Lee was not very explicit he became impersonal and talked of whatever came into his mind—motors, irrigation, hunting, flowers; anything at all—and the girl had nothing to do but to utter an occasional phrase to show that she was listening. It was all rather depressing to her, for she could not understand how a man so garrulous could be a good physician. She was quite sure her mother would not treat him with the slightest respect.

After all, he talked well. His stream of conversation shortened the way for her. Soon they were talking quietly up the street in the door of the Wetherford house.

They found Lize on duty behind the counter, as usual. Her face was dejected, her eyes dull, but as she caught sight of the strange little man she cried out, "Why didn't you bring me a man, Reddy?"

"Hush, mother!" cautioned Lee. "This is the famous eastern physician."

"You can't be famous for your beauty; you must be healthy," she remarked to herself in the stranger's hearing.

Redfield presented "Dr. Fossenden of Omaha."

She started a little at the commonplace way, but was stopped by the little man, "Don't you see that child?"

"You must be healthy," she remarked to herself in the stranger's hearing.

Lize flushed with surprise and anger, but stayed, and Lee Virginia, secretly delighted with the physician's impudent manner, led the way into the lodging house. "I'll look after the cash, mother," she said. "Don't worry."

"I'm not worrying," she replied. "But what does that little fellow mean by talking to me like that? I'll swear but one of the best of them."

"If his way please don't anger him. You need his help."

"Tol will she obey? I've argued that with her. She keeps saying she will, but she won't."

It was nearly 1, but the customers were coming in, and the girl, laying aside her hat and veil, took her seat at the cash register, while Redfield went out to put his machine in order for the return trip. She realized that she was now at close hand grapple with life.

"GET DOWN OUT OF THAT CHAIR!"

Her glowing cheeks, her pretty dress made her a shining mark, and the men began at once to improve their opportunity by asking, "Where's Lize?" And this embarrassed her, for the reason that she did not care to go into the cause of her mother's temporary absence.

Perceiving her nervousness, Nell Ballard raised her head over a mistake she made in returning change, and this so confused and angered her that her eyes misted with tears, and she blundered sadly with the next customer. His delight in her discomfiture, his words, his grin, became unendurable, and in a flash of rage and despair she sprang to her feet and left them to make triumphant exit. "I got her rattled," he roared as he went out. "She'll remember me."

The diners were all smiling, and Gregg took a malicious satisfaction in her defeat. She had held herself haughtily apart from him, and he was glad to see her humbled.

Leaving her place behind the counter, she walked through the room with uplifted head and burning eyes, her heart filled with bitterness and fire. She hated the whole town, the whole state at the moment. Were these "the chivalrous short grass knights" she had heard so much about—these the large souled "western founders of empire" that all the heroes of her childhood had been of the stamp of Nell Ballard?

In the hall her pride, her sense of duty, came back to her, and she halted her feeling feet. "I will not be treated," she declared, and her lips straightened. "I will not let these dreadful creatures make a fool of me in that way."

Thereupon she turned and went back, pale now, but resolved to prove herself the mistress of the situation. Fortunately Redfield had returned, and his serene presence helped her to recover complete control of herself. She remained coldly blank to every compliment, and by this means she subdued them.

The doctor, appearing suddenly in the door, beckoned to her, and, leaving her place, she crossed to where he stood. "Your mother needs you," he said calmly. "Go to her and keep her quiet for an hour or two if you can."

"What is the matter, doctor?"

"I can't tell you precisely, but you must get her out of a diet and keep her there. I will write out some lists for you after my luncheon."

Lee found her mother sitting in such dejection, she had never known her to display, though she tried so sufficiently to say: "That cursed little thing—Lize—has been throwing a great big scare into me. He says I've got to get outdoors, live on raw meat and work up and wash five times a day. That's what he says," she added in renewed astonishment at the man's audacity. "Who's at the cash?"

"Mr. Redfield," replied Lee. "I'll go right back."

"No, you won't. I'm no dead horse yet." She struggled to her feet and started for the cash register. "I won't let no little Omaha doggie like that put me out of business."

Despite a warning she walked out into the dining room and took her accustomed seat with serene face, while her daughter went to the table where the doctor sat and explained her inability to manage her mother.

"That's your problem," he replied coolly. "Then rapidly, succinctly and clearly he went over the case and laid out a course of treatment. Out of it all Lee deduced that her mother was very ill indeed, though not in danger of sudden death."

"She's on the verge," said Fossenden, "and everything depends upon her own action whether she takes the plunge this winter or twenty years from now. She's a strong woman, or has been, but she has presumed upon her strength. She used to live out of doors, she tells me, during all her early life, and now, shut in by these walls, working sixteen hours a day, she is killing herself. Get her out if you can and cut out stimulants."

As he rose and approached the counter, Lize showed a couple of gold pieces across the board. "That wipes you off my map," she grimly declared. "I hope you enjoyed your ride."

"It's up to you, madam," he replied, pocketing the gold. "Good day."

"I'll be down again in a day or two," called Redfield.

The machine began to purr and spit and the wheels to spin, and Lee Virginia was left to face her mother's obstinate resistance alone. She felt suddenly very desolate, very weak and very poor. "What if mother should die?" she asked herself.

Gregg was standing before the counter, talking with Lize as Lee returned, and he said, with a broad smile, "I've just been saying I'd take this hotel off your mother's hands provided you went with it."

In the months of some men these words would have been harmless enough, but coming from the tongue of one whose life could only be obscurely hinted at the last was an insult. The girl shuddered with repulsion, and Lize spoke out:

"Now, see here, Ballard, I'm dead on the hoof and all that, but neither you nor any other citizen like you can

At Meeting of Pomona Grange Held Thursday.

Next Place of Meeting Left to Executive Committee.

Charlevoix County Pomona Grange No. 40 was royally entertained by Pine Lake grange February 16. Owing to the very inclement condition of the roads and threatening weather the attendance was not large, only four officers reporting for duty.

Regular grange work was supplemented by numerous songs, recitations and readings. The two principal topics discussed were "The County Road System" and "The Canadian Reciprocity Treaty". Sentiment was decidedly in favor of adopting the County Road System while on the latter question opinion was divided. Hon. J. M. Harris, of Boyne City, gave a short talk during the afternoon recess, in which he emphasized the educational value of association and the great need of co-operation between all organizations along lines wherein interests are identical.

The following granges were declared the banner granges of the county: For the third quarter 1910, Marion Centre; for the fourth quarter, Harmony Grange.

Three applicants for the fifth degree were received.

The executive committee was instructed to fix time and place of next meeting.

The local Knights of Pythias lodge are to produce that famous classic play "Damon and Pythias" at the local play house on Friday evening, March 10. Mr. Will H. Griffin, who has been most successful in seasons past with such plays as "The Crisis" and others of that calibre, has charge of the production and will play that famous character of Damon, to Mr. Will Hampton's Pythias. The balance of the cast is in the hands of the most talented people in town. The magnificent costumes of the K. P. order is required to dress the play and it is safe to say that no theatrical performance was ever dressed more gorgeously.

The wardrobe alone represents an expenditure of about $300 and adds wonderfully in the forming of the greatest stage picture ever seen locally. The play, as everyone knows, is the most beautiful of the classics and its powerful and fascinating story holds the audience with its intense interest from the start to the finish. Damon and Pythias will undoubtedly be the greatest literary triumph that Charlevoix has ever known.

March 22 has been fixed as the date of the annual play of the senior class. This year's offering will be "What Happened to Smith," or "Facing the Music." A comedy in three acts, under the management of Miss Cotton. The class are hard at work and will score another success as is always true of senior plays.

"Checkmate."
The second musical comedy in about a year will be seen at the Charlevoix theatre Friday evening of this week when "Checkmate" will be produced for the benefit of the Charlevoix City Band under the direction of Leon F. Brower, who successfully produced Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde last November. Plenty of musical numbers will be introduced and lots of laughs will be there to help the merriment to its height. "Checkmate" has a social and aristocratic air which is pleasing to everyone. Twenty four of the young talent in this city will render a very pleasing night's entertainment. Seats will be on sale at Chapel's Thursday and Friday at popular prices. The band will render the following selections before and during the show:

Grand Rapids Letter Carriers' Band by W. S. Ripley.
Overture—Hearts of Oak by W. S. Ripley.
March—Remembrance by Walter Lewis.
Floral Overture by George D. Barnard.
March—Good News by W. Parish Chambers.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

That local option has been a success in Emmet county, especially in Petoskey, is conceded by fair-minded persons in a position to judge. There is no question that, from a moral standpoint, most desirable results have been obtained.

Emmet county went "dry" in the spring of 1909, so that local option has had less than two years' trial. Though liquor has been obtained, it has not been consumed in such large quantities as was formerly the case, and Petoskey has been a cleaner city, and Emmet a cleaner county. A year before local option was carried, this city, which has a population bordering on 5,000, employed four night patrolmen. Since the law has been in operation this number has been reduced to one, and his presence is seldom required. During December and January there were no arrests for drunkenness in the city, and the county jail and poor house have been little used for several months.

The foremost merchants of the city, who have been interviewed, have declared with one exception, that business has been better during the last two years than before, and that "exception" did not make a statement. One grocer told of 18 per cent gain in trade for six months in a "dry" year over the same months in a "wet" year, another gave figures from his books which showed an increase of 33 per cent in 1910 over 1907, and a jewelry store enjoyed an increase of 31 per cent in the same way. Other reports, equally favorable, were made. Moreover bills have been paid in a great many instances, more promptly than has formerly been the case.

Petoskey is a resort town, and skeptical persons have feared that summer business would be ruined by local option; that tourists would cease coming to northern Michigan. Some regular visitors have gone to other resorts during the last two years, possibly because they could not get liquor at Petoskey and suburbs, but their places have been taken by others who came here because their children could not secure it. The last two years have been as successful seasons as Petoskey and vicinity have ever enjoyed.

During the last few months, a new laundry has been built in Petoskey, two other business blocks are in process of construction, and private residences for permanent and summer use are being erected in and near the city. The paper mill, inactive for several years, is about to resume operation.

Petoskey's ministers praise local option from all standpoints, "the most of them having studied the effects in every way possible.

A sufficient number of signatures was secured by the "wets" to put the question to vote again next spring. Among the men who signed the paper are some who formerly expressed themselves in favor of local option, but these declare that they attached their signatures to the "wet" petition to give the people a chance to decide again, and that their ideas have not changed. Other men formerly "wet" are now "dry" and "wet" who was an active worker against local option two years ago, says: "It is dry; let it stay so. There can never be any excuse for saloons."—Detroit Times.

Neighborhood Notes

Traverse City is endeavoring to have itself placed on the aviation map. For several months Andrew Smith of that place, whose inventions have been attracting considerable attention and several of which have been very successful, has been at work upon the construction of a gasoline engine designed for air ships which he has now fully perfected.

Uncle Sam has branched out as a logging operator in upper Michigan. With an official of the light-house department in charge, the government is cutting timber near Grand Marais, Alger county. A crew of twenty men will be busy until spring. The cutting is on the light-house reserve east of town. One hundred thousand feet of timber will be cut and in addition much underbrush will be cleared. It is intended to use the timber in light-house department construction.

Pentwater is likely to be one of the terminal ports for a Lake Michigan boat line if the plans of the transportation committee of the Milwaukee Merchants' and Manufacturers' association are successful. In favoring the Pentwater line, the committee points out that during the winter Milwaukee shipments have been routed to Pentwater via White Cloud and around the loop to Muskegon and north to Pentwater with a delay of from two to three days. With a new line direct to Pentwater it is pointed out boats would make semi-weekly trips, thus offering better and speedier connection with the east.

A suit brought by Attorney General Knott against Alcona county to compel it to build a jail has been brought to the Bay county circuit court on a charge of venue from the Alcona circuit court. The Alcona county jail was burned in 1904 and the board of supervisors voted $500 at various times toward "repairing the jail" but an injunction was issued against it to force the discontinuance of such a practice on the grounds that the jail was not being repaired but rebuilt and that no money could be expended for such purposes unless by a two-thirds vote of the board. The injunction was set aside.

torney general contends that the taxpayers have paid a great deal unnecessary money maintaining prisoners in the jails of adjoining counties. The board of supervisors declare that it was never possible for them to rebuild the jail as, instead of having a two-thirds vote as was required the members were equally divided. They also contend that when the question was submitted to the people a two-thirds vote was not in favor of rebuilding the institution. The board contends that its hands have been tied so it could do nothing in the matter. The county has $2,900 insurance from the old building which has been set aside to rebuild the jail but it cannot be used unless by a two-thirds vote of either the board of supervisors or the people. The walls of a new building were erected before the injunction was issued but the structure is without roof or partitions and the attorney general alleges that the weather is deteriorating it.

Men About Town and Drink.

It is, I think, a common experience of the man about town that his associates in general drink less than they did five or ten years ago. Go into any restaurant in New York where business men congregated at the lunch hour, and you will note that a large number of tables, often the majority, have no beverage but water. As a general rule the waiter will not thrust the wine card before you with the old time insistence, knowing from experience that you probably do not want it. Even at dinner time in these same restaurants many tables show no wineglasses, whereas formerly they were all full. Moreover, it is distinctly the rule, even at private dinner parties of some formality, to serve a single wine, following the English custom, whereas until recently New Yorkers were notorious for "mixing" their drinks.

Of course I do not mean to imply that wines are not still served in conventional sequence, from cocktail and sherry to port and liquor at formal banquets and by many less vivacious, but I speak of the prevailing custom, and this assuredly has altered very decidedly within the last decade. Clearly, then, the temperance spirit is abroad in metropolitan no less than in rural districts.—Century Magazine.

London's Lock Step Fad.

Do you know the "lock step"? If not, says the Paris Mail, go to London and take a look over the principal arteries of that immense capital. In order to do the "lock step" you jump from one leg to the other with a firm and rhythmic movement, and you let one leg remain in the air an instant, just like a chicken in distress in a pool of water. The famous "lock step" was hatched by one of the big theaters of the capital, and since then all the Londoners, amused by it, have tried their best, no matter where they find themselves, to master the secret of its endurance. The success of the new fad has been such that, according to the Mail, "professors of lock step" hire men to go about the streets marking the time of the movement and distributing prospectuses bearing the address of the masters in the art of the "lock step."

The King's Gloved Hand.

It is not generally known that King George's custom of appearing with his right hand gloved and the other bare has its origin in something more than a mere whim of fashion. The wearing of a glove on the right hand by a monarch is a distinct survival of the days when the sovereign's touch was held to be a certain cure for all kinds of diseases, especially scrofula.

In the days when at certain dates it was customary for hundreds of sick men and members of all kinds to be laid out in the courtyard of royal palaces awaiting the healing touch of the "anointed of the Lord" monarchs found it necessary to wear a glove in order to escape infection. Thus arose the habit which during modern times has passed into a mere fad of fashion, the significance of which has long been forgotten by the majority of the people.

An Actors' Festival.

John Maudslayi, a student of the Middle Temple in Shakespeare's time, recorded how the Yuletide revels of the law students in 1601 ended with a play given in the great hall of the Middle Temple. "At our feast we had a play called 'Twelfth Night, or, What Ye Will.'"

With actor folk Twelfth Night has always been a favorite festival. Bad delay, the famous comedian, when he died left all his money to provide cake and wine for the yearly celebration of "Twelfth Night" in the gown room at the Drury Lane theater.

Even now in New York the leading members of the American stage can be seen on the night of Jan. 6, when they come together either as performers or as spectators in the annual all star production of the Twelfth Night club.—Mary Edith Griswold in Esquire.

be funny with my girl. She's not for you. Now, that's dual! She ain't your kind."

She turned to Lee. "I'm hungry. Where's that grub that of mine?"

Lee brought the doctor's page of notes and read it through, while her mother, snorting at intervals: "Huh! Dry toast, work tea, no coffee, no alcohol. Huh! I might as well starve. Eggs—fish—milk! Why didn't he say boiled live rosters and champagne? I tell you right now I'm not going to go into that kind of a game. If I die I'm going to die eating what I blame please!"

The struggle had begun. With desperate courage Lee fought, standing squarely in the rut of her mother's daily habit. "You must not live up here any longer," she insisted. "You must get out and walk and ride. I can take care of the house, at least till we can sell it."

It was like breaking the pride of an athlete, but little by little she forced upon her mother a realization of her true condition, and at last Lize consented to offer the business for sale.

Lee lounged for the presence of Ross Cavanagh at this moment, when all her little world seemed tumbling into ruin, and almost in answer to her wordless prayer came a messenger from the little telephone office. "Some one wants to talk to you."

She answered this call hurriedly, thinking at first that it must be Mrs. Redfield. The booth was in the little sitting room of a private cottage, and the mistress of the place, a shrewd little woman with impulsive eyes, said, "Sounds to me like Ross Cavanagh's voice."

Lee was thankful for the booth's privacy, for her cheeks flamed up at this remark, and when she took up the receiver her heart was beating so loud it seemed as if the person at the other end of the wire must hear it. "Who is it, please?" she asked, with breathless intensity.

A man's voice came back over the wire so clear, so distinct, so intimate, it seemed as if he were speaking into her ear. "It is I, Ross Cavanagh. I want to ask how your mother is."

"She is terribly disheartened by what the doctor has said, but she is in no immediate danger."

He perceived her agitation and was instantly sympathetic. "Can I be of use? Do you need me? If you do I'll come down."

"Where are you?"

"I sit at the sawmill, the nearest telephone station."

"How far away are you?"

"About thirty miles."

"Oh!" She expressed in this little sound her disappointment, and as it trembled over the wire he spoke quickly: "Please tell me! Do you want me to come down? Never mind the distance. I can ride it in a few hours."

She was leapt, but bravely said: "No, I'd like to see you, of course, but the doctor said mother was in no danger. You must not come on our account."

He felt the wonder of the moment's intercourse over the wilderness steps and said so. "You can't imagine how strangely sweet and civilized your voice sounds to me here in this savage place. It makes me hope that some day you and Mrs. Redfield will come up and visit me in person."

"I should like to come."

"Perhaps it would do your mother good to camp for awhile. Can't you persuade her to do so?"

"I'm trying to do that—I mean, to stop work—but she says, 'What can we do to earn a living?'"

"If nothing happens I hope to spend an hour or two at the Fork next Sunday. I hope to find your mother better."

Their words were of this unemotional sort, but in their voices something sadder than the electrical current vibrated. He called to her in wordless fashion, and she answered in the same mysterious code, and when she said "Goodbye!" and hung up the receiver her world went suddenly gray and commonplace, as if a ray of special sunlight had been withdrawn.

CHAPTER X.

ONE morning as he topped the rise between the sawmill and his own station Cavanagh heard two rifle shots in quick succession snapping across the high peak on his left. Bringing his horse to a stand, he nuzzing his fieldglasses and slowly and intently swept the tawny slopes of Sheep Mountain, from which the forbidden sounds seemed to come.

"A herder shooting coyotes," was his first thought. Then, remembering that there were no camps in that direction and that a flock of mountain sheep (which he had been guarding carefully) had lately fed upon that craggy peak, his mind changed. "I wonder if those fellows are the three sheep-herders I heard of? He nudged down the slope. 'I reckon it's up to me to see."

In less than three hours he was over on the trail in the canyon, quite certain that the hunters were still above him. He rode quietly up the valley, pausing often to listen and to scrutinize the landscape, but no sign of campfire, and no further rifle shots came, and at last he went into camp upon the trail, resolved to wait till the poachers appeared, a word which his experience as a soldier helped him to maintain without doubt.

In these long hours his thought played about the remembrance of his last visit to the Fork and his hour with Lize. He wondered what she was doing at the moment. How charming she had looked there at Redfield's—so girlish in form, so serious and womanly of face!

He felt as never before the incredible loneliness of the ranger's life. The guardians of these high places must forever be solitary. No ranger could rightfully be husband and father, for to bring women and children into these solitudes would be cruel.

He put all this aside—for the time—by remembering that he was a soldier under orders and that marriage was a long way off, and so smoked his pipe and waited for the dawn, persistent as a Sioux and as silent as a fox.

At daylight, there being still no sign of his quarry, he saddled his horse and was about to ride up the trail when he caught the sound of voices and the sharp click of iron hoofs on the rocks above him. With his horse's bridle in his arm he awaited the approaching horsemen, resolute and ready to act.

As the marauders rounded the elbow in the trail he was surprised to recognize in the leader young Gregg. The other man was a stranger, an older man, with a grizzled beard, and tall and stooping figure.

"Hello, Joe!" called the ranger. "You're up early!"

The youth's face betrayed uneasiness. "Yes, it's a long pull into town."

"Been hunting?" queried the ranger, still with cheery, polite interest.

"Oh, no; just visiting one of my sheep camps."

Cavanagh's voice was a little less suave. "Not on this creek," he declared. "I moved your herder last week."

"He walked forward. 'That's a heavy load for a short trip to a sheep camp.' He put his hand on the pack. 'I guess you'll have to open this, for I heard two shots yesterday morning up where that flock of mountain sheep is running, and, further, more, I can see blood stains on this saddle blanket.'"

Gregg threw out a hand in command. "Open it up, Edwards!" he said suddenly.

Off came the outfit, and under the tent lay the noble head of a wild ram, a look of reproach still in his splendid yellow eyes.

Cavanagh's face hardened. "I thought so. Now leave it back and elch up. It's you to the nearest magistrate, which happens to be Higley of Roaring Fork. I'll make an example of you fellows."

There was nothing for Gregg to say and nothing for Edwards to do but obey, for a resolute ranger with an excellent weapon of the last and most approved angular pattern stood ready to enforce his command, and when the pack was reached, Cavanagh waved an imperative hand. "I guess I'll have to take charge of your guns," he said, and they yielded without a word of protest. "Now march: Take the left hand trail."

A couple of hours of silent travel brought them to the ranger's cabin, and there he ordered a dismount.

As the coffee was boiling he lectured them briefly. "You fellows are not entirely to blame," he remarked philosophically. "You've been educated to think a game warden a joke and Uncle Sam a long way off. But things have changed a bit. The law of the state has made me game warden, and I'm going to show you how it works. It's my duty to see that you go down the road—and down you go!"

Edwards, the guide, was plainly very uneasy, and made several attempts to reach Cavanagh's private ear and at last succeeded. "I've been fooled into this," he urged. "I was hard up and a stranger in the country, and this young fellow hired me to guide him across the range. I didn't shoot a thing. I swear I didn't. If you'll let me off I'll hit the trail to the west and never look back. Don't take me down the road. Let me off."

"I can't do that," replied Cavanagh, but his tone was kinder, for he perceived that the old fellow was thin, hollow chested and poorly clad. "You knew you were breaking the laws, didn't you?"

This the culprit admitted. "But I was working for Sam Gregg, and when Joe asked me to go show him the trail I didn't expect to get clusled for killing game. I didn't fire a shot—now that's the truth."

"Nevertheless," retorted Ross, "you were packing the head, and I must count you in the game."

Edwards fell silent then, but something in his look deepened the ranger's pity. His eyes were large and dark, and his face so emaciated that he seemed fit only for a sanatorium.

The trip to the Fork timed to the gait of a lazy pack horse was a tedious eight hours' march, and it was nearly 7 o'clock when they arrived at the outskirts of the village.

To the casual observer in a town of this character there was nothing specially noticeable in these horsemen driving a pack horse, but to those whose eyes were keen the true relationship of the ranger to his captives was instantly apparent, and when they alighted at Judge Higley's office a bunch of eager observers quickly collected.

"Hello, Joe! What luck?" called Ballard.

"Our luck was a little too good—we caught a game warden," replied the young scapegrace.

The ranger was chagrined to find the office of the justice closed for the day and, turning to his captives, said: "I'm hungry, and I've no doubt you are. I'm going to take you into Mike Halsey's saloon for supper, but remember you are my prisoners."

In fifteen minutes the town was rumbling with the news. Under Ballard's devilry all the latent hatred of the ranger and all the concealed opposition to the forest service came to the surface like the scum on a pot of broth. The saloons and eating houses boiled with indignant protest. "What business is it of Ross Cavanagh's?" they demanded. "What call has he to interfere? He's not a game warden."

"Yes, he is. All these rangers are game wardens," corrected another.

"No, they're not. They have to be commissioned by the governor."

"Well, he's been commissioned. He's warden all right."

"I don't believe it. Anyhow, he's too fresh. He needs to have a halt. Let's do him. Let's bluff him out."

Lee Virginia was in the kitchen superintending the service when one of the waiters came in breathless with excitement. "Ross Cavanagh has shot Joe Gregg for killing sheep!"

Lee faced her with blanched face. "Who told you so?"

"They're all talking about it out there. Gee, but they're hot! Some of 'em want to lynch him."

Lee hurried out into the dining room, which was crowded with men and voicing deep excitement.

A half dozen men were standing before the counter talking with Lize, but Lee pushed in to inquire with white, inquiring face: "What is it all about? What has happened?"

"Nothing much," Lize replied contemptuously, "but you'd think a horse had been stole. Ross has slipped Joe Gregg and one of his herders for killing mountain sheep."

"Do you mean he shot them?"

"Yes, he took their heads."

Lee stood aghast. "What do you mean? Whose heads?"

Lize laughed. "The sheep's heads. Oh, don't be scared! No one is hurt yet."

The girl flushed with confusion as the men roared over her blunder. "One of the girls told me Mr. Cavanagh had killed a man," she explained. "Where is he?"

Lize betrayed annoyance. "They say he's taking supper at Mike Halsey's, though why he didn't come here I don't see. What's he going to do?" she asked. "Won't the marshal take the men off his hands?"

"Not without warrant from Higley, and Higley is out of town. Ross'll have to hold 'em till Higley gets back or else take 'em over to Chauvenet."

Lize snorted. "Old Higley! Yes, he's been known to disappear before when there was some real work to be done."

Lee went back to her own task with a vague sense of alarm. "Certainly they will not dare to interfere with an officer in the discharge of his duties," she thought. She was eager to see him, and the thought that he might be obliged to ride away to Chauvenet without a word to her gave her a deeper feeling of annoyance and unrest. That he was in any real danger she could not believe.

It was disheartening to Cavanagh to see how some of the most influential citizens contrived to give encouragement to the riotous element of the town. A wink, a gesture, a careless word to the proper messenger, conveyed to the saloon rangers an assurance of sympathy which inflamed their resentment to the murderous point. It was confessedly one of the worst communities in the state.

"Let's run Cavanagh!" was the suggestion of several of Gregg's friends.

The fact that the ranger was a commissioned officer of the law and that the man's head had been found on the poacher's pack made very little difference to these irresponsible instigators to assault. "It was wonderful how highly that loading young rascal, Joe Gregg, was prized at the moment!"

"It's an outrage that the son of a leading citizen should be held up in this way by one of the forestry Cossacks," declared one of the merchants.

The discussion which took place over the bars of the town was at the riot heat by 10 o'clock, and soon after 10 a crowd of howling, whooping bad boys and disreputable ranch hands were parading the walks, breathing out vile threats against the ranger.

TREATMENT OF SEED CORN.

Proper Methods, According to Washington Authority on the Cereal.

In farmers' bulletin No. 115, on "Seed Corn," E. P. Hartley, one of the corn experts of the United States department of agriculture, asserts that the same day seed corn is gathered the husked ears should be put in a dry place where there is free circulation of air and placed in such a manner that the ears do not touch each other. This is the only safe procedure. The writer has repeatedly seen good seed ruined because it was thought to be already dry enough when gathered and then the precaution mentioned above was unnecessary. Many farmers believe that their autumn is so dry that such care is superfluous. Seed corn in every locality gathered at ripening time will be benefited by drying as suggested. If left in the husk long after ripening it may sprout or mildew during warm, wet weather or become infested with weevils.

The vitality of seed is often reduced by leaving it in a sack or in a pile for even a day after gathering. During warm weather, with some moisture in the air and kernels, the ears heat or mildew in a remarkably short time.

The best possible treatment immediately after gathering is shown in the illustration. Blower twice will support fifteen or twenty ears on a string arranged in the manner illustrated. Ordinarily the best place to hang these strings of ears is in an open shed or loft.

Permanent seed racks, with a separate compartment for each ear, are more convenient than the use of binder twine, and when they are located in a dry, breezy place the ears dry successfully.

VENTILATION FOR TOBACCO.

Method of Curing Leaf Used by Large Growers in Pennsylvania.

The majority of the small tobacco growers thresh out their grain early, stack their straw and then use their barn mows and driveways for curing tobacco, says a bulletin on the production of cigar leaf tobacco in Pennsylvania issued by the United States department of agriculture. But the large growers usually erect separate curing sheds provided with some system for controlling the ventilation. In some cases top ventilation is secured by means of slatted ventilators set in the gable ends of the shed or in the roof along the ridgepole or by means of valved, cylindrical, metal ventilators set in the roof peak. In other sheds ventilation is adopted, and other vertical ventilators are made by inserting loose boards at intervals of a few feet along the sides of the shed or horizontal boards, hinged above and fastened to a common vertical lifting rod, are fixed in the sides of the shed at points near the lower end of each tier. In still other cases the door beams project on each side beyond the foundation walls, and the wall plates rest upon the ends of these beams rather than directly over of upon the foundation walls. The door between these two lines of walls consists of trapdoors which can be raised to secure bottom ventilation.

Very commonly the system adopted provides for both side and roof ventilators, each under control from the floor, or for bottom and top ventilators. Heating systems for the control of ventilation are very exceptional.

PROTECT YOUR FARM MACHINERY.

Farm machinery is often neglected when it is a case of not uncommon to see blades, cultivators, grain chaffers, etc., left out all winter in the field where they were last used or in the barnyard. Here they are exposed to the sun, rain and snow. The depreciation from a rusted machine is more than they are worth.

Keep Strings Out of Horses' Mouths. Have a man stand by the feed table of the barn and catch out every hand and foot that comes away. Those strings cut up in short lengths and carried into the shed or barn for stock. A man may see a piece of four-cow that was fed on this plan, and the cut strings did the damage. They are cut so fine and red, so that only that stock must eat them. The time of one man to do this work probably be well spent down from shed.

Proper Way to Feed a Horse. The stomach of the horse is quite small—that is, it will hold about two gallons. If the horse is fed his grain first, then hay and then water, the grain will be pushed out of the stomach before it is digested. The best way is to water first, then feed some hay and then the grain. In case the horse is warm it would not do to give all the water it would like, but it should be given a little even then.

PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

WHAT INTERESTS OF MICHIGAN

Are Affected by Proposed Reciprocity Treaty.

NOW PENDING BEFORE U. S. SENATE

Will Open Large Market to Michigan Manufacturers

Price of Farm Products Will Probably be Lowered—Will Advantages be Equal to Lower Price of Farm Products.

Below is the statistics of the proposed Canadian reciprocity treaty that effect, Michigan.

MOTOR VEHICLES

Under the pending agreement for reciprocal tariff legislation by the United States and Canada the latter offers to reduce her duty on automobiles and parts thereof by one-seventh, or from 35 per cent to 30 per cent ad valorem. United States export figures show that Canada purchased automobiles and automobile parts from United States during the calendar year 1910 to the value of $5,021,043. Canadian statistics substantially confirm this statement by showing imports from the United States during the first eleven months of 1910 to have been valued at $3,663,340—the value being stated by the importers as possible so as to decrease the duties to be paid. The duties to be remitted by Canada under the agreement will thus amount to over $200,000 per annum. Inasmuch as the manufacture of motor vehicles in the Dominion is still in its incipient stages this concession appears likely to give American manufacturers permanent control of the Canadian automobile market. Michigan's great interest in this industry is a matter of general knowledge, although no recent statistics to show her annual product will be available prior to the publication of the 1910 Census of Manufacturers.

FARM WAGONS

Farm wagons from the United States will be admitted into Canada at a reduction of one-fifth from her former rate, which was 25 per cent of the value of the wagon. During Canadian fiscal year ending March 31, 1910, Canada imported $210,000 worth of farm wagons from the United States. The manufacture of wagons and carriages in Michigan's eighth manufacturing industry, her annual output being valued at over $12,000,000 by the 1905 Census of Manufacturers.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

Canada has agreed to remove one-fourth of her duties on threshing machines, plows, harrows, drills, horse-rakes, cultivators and part of the foregoing, when imported from the United States. These articles will be taxed by her at 15 per cent instead of 20 per cent. During Canada's fiscal year ending March 31, 1910, she bought the above machinery from this country to a value of $2,589,000, and taxed it $567,200.

On harvesters, reapers and mowers Canada will reduce her duty by one-seventh, or from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent. Our sale to Canada of harvesters, mowers and reapers during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1910, totaled $518,000, and the duties levied upon them, by Canada were $89,000.

Canada will lower her rates by one-fifth, or from 25 per cent to 20 per cent, on a list of farm implements including feed cutters, fan-mills, potato diggers, and hay tedders. Imports of this machinery into the Dominion from the United States during the period just indicated were valued at approximately $100,000, and were taxed at nearly $25,000.

The total volume of our export of agricultural implements and parts to Canada during calendar year 1910 was $1,321,000. Michigan ranks fifth among the states in manufacturing farm tools and machinery, her product being not far from $10,000,000 annually.

CEMENT

Portland cement from this country will be admitted into Canada under the agreement at 11 cents per 100 pounds instead of 12½ cents per 100 pounds. The latter rate, which is now in force, excluded all but $50,000 worth of American cement from Canada in Canadian fiscal year 1910. During calendar year 1908 Michigan's output of cement was valued at $2,500,000, her position among the cement-producing states being sixth.

CEREAL BREAKFAST FOODS
Canada will remit three-tenths of her duty on this important line of manufactures, coming down from 25 per cent to 17½ per cent. Her imports from the United States during 1910, amounted to over $200,000 in value. Michigan's prominence in the manufacture of cereal package preparation is well known.

CANNED FRUIT AND VEGETABLES
Canada is to reduce her duties by ½ cent per pound on these products, a concession which should be of interest to a state which produced nearly $2,000,000 worth of them in 1904. Canada's imports from the United States of fruits and vegetables preserved in tin packages were valued at approximately $125,000 during the Canadian fiscal year ended March 31, 1910.

FRESH FRUITS AND VEGETABLES
These products will be mutually free under the pending arrangement. (Continued on page 8.)

TRAVELS OF A FREIGHT CAR

Eighteen Month's Wanderings of Old One Thousand.

Of Boyne City Gaylord & Alpena Railroad Company.

About eighteen months ago the B. C. G. & A. R. R. company sent out a freight car to Gaylord that was in some way lost at that place and disappeared from the knowledge of the officials as completely and mysteriously as though it had dropped through a hole in the earth or been carried away by an aviator on a trip to the moon. The railroad company has spent a lot of money, time and trouble in trying to locate the car but to no purpose and it was given up as completely lost when to their surprise "old one thousand," (as the railroad men call the car from its being No. 1000) came rattling into the yards yesterday after a trip clear across the continent from Maine to California, and a rather tempestuous career of wreck, storm and sunshine that lasted for a year and a half in all kinds of weather and with a long bill of claims for doctor bills and repairs that made the local officials wake up and take notice.

It then transpired that when "One Thousand" was sent on its trip to Gaylord 18 months ago that it was "shunted" off on the M. C. track and picked up by one of its trains. From there it began a life of wild frivolity.

Starting on its career of mad adventure it took a trip through the oil regions of Pennsylvania and Virginia, then to the cotton fields of the Carolinas, where firing of carrying rice and sweet potatoes, it made a jump straight north to the lumber woods of Maine and New Hampshire. South again over the Adirondacks and through the foothills of the Alleghenies to Chicago then off on a southern tack to the orange groves of Florida, up across the "dark and bloody grounds," through the fend cursed regions of Kentucky, away to the "Father of Waters," and then in one wild, lit of hilarity, exuberance jumping north to the wilds of British Columbia.

Not caring to remain long under King George's sway "Old One Thousand" came skeltering back to "the land of the free," swept the coast from Washington to California, climbed the Rockies, explored the wheat farms of Montana and the Dakotas and then in one spectacular, spiral glide swooped southward to the Lone Star state, where its timbers dried up and shrank in the arid temperature and becoming sick of its roving life, it made its way back through old Arkansas, Missouri and Illinois to Chicago, where, suffering the fresh breeze from Lake Michigan, "Did One Thousand" came wandering back home.

The car has been through several wrecks and has been repaired and rebuilt so many times that it is practically a new car. The company of course gets pay for the use of the wanderer from the time it left Boyne City to its return, but the bill for repairs is more than the receipts so that the company has lost quite a bit and the officials are glad to see the prodigal return be-

Grange Display at Traverse City in 1910.

At the last two sessions of the state grange, held in Traverse City, Charlevoix county has been very much in the limelight. At the 1909 session a display was made of the products of this county, which far eclipsed the display put up by any other county. The work that year was under the charge of a committee of five made up as follows: D. S. Payton, chairman; E. E. Strand, H. L. Olney, Martin Ruffing and Geo. McLean, with sub-committees from each grange in the county. The supervisors realizing the vast benefit which such a display would be to the county, appropriated one hundred dollars which, in part, paid the expenses.

In addition to the display one day was designated as Charlevoix Day, when a demonstration was made, the arrangements for which were perfected by E. B. Ward, at that time, master of Pontons. Over one thousand visitors were in Traverse City Charlevoix Day.

This year's display was under charge of a committee of three consisting of Nat Burns, chairman; E. H. Clark and Martin Staley. Notwithstanding it was a poor year for fruit a grand display was made as well as a splendid showing of other products of the farm. (The whole display being awarded the first premium for display made by counties. As the year before the supervisors made a hundred dollars appropriation for expenses.

While no particular effort was made to fill the city with Charlevoix bonhomie, a large number were on hand all the time, boosting for Charlevoix and the work of the grange in promoting and pushing these displays has resulted in advertising Charlevoix county in every hamlet in Michigan.

BREED THOROUGHBREDS

Care in Selection and Breeding of the Dairy Herd.

Extracts From a Very Interesting Address by N. P. Hull.

In a recent discussion on the subject of Selection and Breeding of the Dairy Herd, Mr. N. P. Hull is quoted substantially as follows:

Before we start out we want to have a well defined idea of what we want. I want to get out of the breeding of my cows, that which will give me the most profit.

I have no objection to say to you that the best dairy cow is the cow for dairy purposes. Men for generations have been breeding these cows for dairy purposes. You get the benefit of what these men have done. The time is past for that purpose cows. The best cow for the dairy is the dairy cow.

Select the cows that are producing the best dairy results and breed to sires whose mothers have the record of doing that thing.

You must supplement the cow's record with the necessary traits which your eye will tell you if you will examine the cow. Freaks are liable not to stand up from year to year unless they have the necessary qualities of constitution and other necessary qualities.

It isn't enough to look good. The cow on my farm that won't take $1 feed and give me at least $1.50 has got to go. I want to say to you that dairymen are working hard enough but the dairymen of Michigan are not using that part of their anatomy above their ears enough.

It's not only the men who are breeding thoroughbred cows, but the great army of men who are handling dairy cows that want to select and breed on better lines. The average cow produces 150 lbs. of butter per year. The average

COMMISSION ORGANIZED

For the Purpose of Framing the Charter for East Jordan.

The Charter commission to whom has been delegated the important task of framing the charter under which the city of East Jordan is to take up its corporate existence held its first meeting in the council room Friday evening.

The commission was organized by the election of Alden E. Cross, president, and Wilbur P. Squier, secretary. Friday evening's meeting being for the purpose of organization, little else was done, although the whole situation was discussed in a general way.

The gentlemen who compose the commission are going to make an earnest endeavor to submit to our people the very best form of charter and to this end will thoroughly investigate both the ordinary form of city government and the new, but very popular form of government by commission.

The charter commission will hold its next meeting at the call of the president.—Enterprise.

LENT BEGINS TODAY

Catholics Must Observe Period of Abstinence

During Preparations for the Great Feast of Easter Sunday.

The observance of the Lenten season, which begins today, will be by all Catholics as well as many of the Protestant denominations. All Catholics 21 years of age and in normal health are required to content themselves with one full meal a day during this period of fasting. Refrainments consisting of a cup of warm liquid and a slice of bread is permitted in the morning and a light lunch of about eight ounces of food, or one third of a full meal, is permissible in the evening.

The Holy Father, Pope Pius X, has further mitigated the abstinence during Lent of those who are compelled to work hard for a living. Meat will be allowed to these for the principal meal on every day except Wednesday and Friday. The working men are also allowed to eat meat for one meal on all the days of abstinence during the year except Ash Wednesday and Wednesday and Saturday of Holy week and Christmas eve.

It is expected that all Catholics will deny themselves personal pleasure and especially abstain from liquors of all kinds during this season. The observance of this period is supposed to be just as rigorous as ever and all Catholics gladly obey the regulations as laid down by the Holy Father.

RURAL CARRIERS MEET

Next Convention to be Held Labor Day

The First Monday in September—Charlevoix is the Place Selected for Same.

The semi-annual meeting of the Rural Letter Carriers Association of Antrim, Charlevoix and Kalamazoo counties was held in Mathers hall, Wednesday, February 22, with a crowd present. There was not much doing in the forenoon but the dinner served by the Gleasons and the Grange was the big feature of the day. After dinner a short business meeting was held and A. Brimail of East Jordan was elected as a delegate to the state convention to be held in Bay City in July. The afternoon session was taken up with a discussion of state reward roads. Asa Maxwell of Elk Rapids, Thomas D. Meggison and J. M. Litch of East Jordan were the principal speakers on this topic. A general discussion was indulged in. It seemed to be the general opinion that it would not be best to build in order to build roads but to go ahead this year and build a mile of state reward road and if the experiment proved satisfactory it would then be well to build. The next meeting to be held in Charlevoix on Labor Day.

Those attending from this city were: Assistant Postmaster Mr. Hinch and the carriers on routes 1, 2 and 4.

James O'Brien is Surprised by a Visit From His Brother.

Washington's birthday—James O'Brien was very much surprised when Alfred Vanhusen and a stranger called at his home, to find out that the supposed stranger was none other than his brother, Alfred O'Brien, whom he had not heard from in thirty-two years. He has four brothers in this county, James, George, Julius and Albert O'Brien. He will be remembered by our old settlers.

During his absence he has traveled much in the south but has bought a home at Hartwick, Osceola county, where he will return in a few days.

That the people of Walloon Lake and Potoskey, as well other places, are taking great interest in the proposed construction of the branch line by the Pere Marquette from Bay Shore to the resort has been shown the past week by the numerous communications and personal interviews which Mr. Cross, representing the railroad, has received. One and all, the expressions have been very favorable toward the proposition, some of the people being interested financially and others from a different standpoint, but all of one heart in the desire to bring about the improvement.

Mr. Cross solicited these interviews and letters with the purpose in view of ascertaining the exact attitude taken by the interested persons in the prospects, and he now believes that success is practically assured. The people will have to take further steps, however, and will be obliged to work in co-operation with the railroad to some extent. To make some definite arrangement on the matter, it is expected that a meeting of railroad representatives and the other parties will be held next week some time.—Potoskey News.

A proposition is before the legislature to abolish the office of county agent in the state department of corrections and charities. It is claimed that the office is more ornamental than necessary and to abolish it will save the state some $30,000 annually.

The compromise is to change the proviso permitting the manufacture and sale of wine or cider as to limit the sale to vinegar. By HAMLIN GARLAND

Accustomed to men of this type, Cavanagh watched them come and go at Halsey's bar with calculating eyes. "There will be no trouble for an hour or two, but meanwhile what is to be done? Higley is not to be found, and the town marshal is also 'out of town.'" To Halsey he said: "I am acting, as you know, under both federal and state authority, and I call upon you as a law-abiding citizen to aid me in holding these men prisoners. I shall camp right here till morning, or until the magistrate or the marshal relieves me of my captives."

Halsey was himself a sportsman—a genuine lover of hunting, and a fairly constant upholder of the game laws; but, perceiving that the whole town had apparently lined up in opposition to the ranger, he lost courage. His consent was half-hearted, and he edged away toward the front window of his barroom, nervously seeking to be neutral—"to carry water on both shoulders," as the phrase goes.

The talk grew less jokey as the drinks took effect, and Nell Ballard, separating herself from the crowd, came forward, calling loudly: "Come out of there, Joe! Come out and have a drink!"

His words conveyed less of battle than his tone. He was, in fact, urging a revolt, and Cavanagh knew it.

Gregg rose as if to comply. The ranger stopped him.

"Keep your seat," said he, and to Ballard he warningly remarked, "And you keep away from my prisoners."

"Do you own this saloon?" retorted the fellow truculently. "I reckon Halsey's customers have some rights. What are you doing here, anyway? This is no jail."

"Halsey has given me the privilege of holding my prisoners here till the justice is found. It isn't my fault that the town is without judge or jail."

He was weakened by the knowledge that Halsey had only half consented to aid him, but his pride was roused, and he determined upon carrying out his arrest to its legitimate end. "I'm going to see that these men are punished if I have to carry them to Sulphur City," he added.

"Smash the lights!" shouted some one at the back.

Here was the first real note of war, and Ross cried out sharply, "If a man lifts a hand toward the light I'll cut it off!"

There was a stealthy movement in the crowd, and, leaping upon the counter, a reckless club reached for the lamp.

Cavanagh's revolver shattered the globe in the fellow's very palm. "Get down from there!" he commanded.

CHAPTER XI.

LIZIE PLAYS A MAN'S PART—ALSO LEE.

THE mob besieging Cavanagh in Halsey's saloon had not found its leader. It hesitated and blundered, but did not strike and eventually edged out of the door and disappeared. But the silence which followed its retreat was more alarming to the ranger than its presence. Some sinister mischief was in these minds. He feared that they were about to cut the electric light wires and so plunge him into darkness, and to prepare for that emergency he called upon the bartender (Halsey having vanished) for a lamp or a lantern.

The fellow silently set about this task, and Ross, turning to Gregg, said, "If you've any influence with this mob you'd better use it to keep them out of mischief, for I'm on this job to the bitter end, and somebody's going to be hurt."

Gregg, who seemed quite detached from the action and rather delighted with it, replied: "I have no influence. They don't care a hang about me. They have it in for you, that's all."

Edwards remained silent, with his hat drawn low over his eyes. It was evident that he was anxious to avoid being seen and quite willing to keep out of the conflict; but, with no hands and the back door of the saloon unguarded, Ross was aware that his guard must be incessant and alertly vigilant.

"Such a thing could not happen under the English flag," he said to himself, and at the moment his admiration seemed a mischievous miscalculation. Only the thought of Ross's aid and the chief moved him for the long vigil. "The chief will understand if it comes up to him," he said.

Lizie Wetherford came hurrying in, looking as though she had just risen from her bed. She was clothed in a long red robe, her grizzled hair was loose, her feet were bare, and she carried a huge old-fashioned revolver in her hand. Her mouth was open.

Stopping abruptly, as she caught sight of Ross standing in the middle of the floor unharmed, she exclaimed: "There you are! Are you all right?"

"As a trivet," he replied.

She let her gun hand relax. "What was the shooting?"

"A little bluff on my part."

"Anybody hurt?"

"No."

"She was much relieved. 'I was afraid they'd got you. I came as quick as I could. I was afraid. That fool doctor threw a chill into me, and I've been going to roost early, according to orders. I didn't hear your gun, but Lee did, and she came to tell me. Don't let 'em get behind you. If I was any-good I'd stay and help. What you going to do—hold your men here all night?"

"I don't see any other way. Halsey turned the place over to me, but—He looked about him suspiciously.

"Bring 'em into my place. Lee has had new beds put on our doors; they'll help some."

"I don't like to do that, Mrs. Wetherford," he replied, with greater respect

"THERE YOU ARE! ARE YOU ALL RIGHT?"

than he had ever shown her before. "They may attack me there."

"All the better; I'll be on hand to help. But they're less likely to bolt in on you through a locked door."

"But your daughter? It will alarm her."

"She'll be in the other house, and, besides, she'd feel easier if you are in my place. She's all wrought up by the attack on you."

Ross turned to his prisoners. "Follow Mrs. Wetherford—and eyes front!"

"You needn't worry about me," said Joe. "I won't run."

"I don't intend to give you a chance," replied Ross.

Edwards seemed to have lost in both courage and physical stature. He slouched along with shuffling step, his head bent and his face pale. Ross was now profoundly sorry for him, so utterly craven and broken was his look.

As Ross brought his two prisoners to the Wetherford house Lee was waiting on the porch of the hotel, tense with excitement, straining her ears and eyes to see what was taking place.

The night had started with a small sickle of moon, but this had dropped below the range, leaving the street dark save where the lights from the windows of the all-night eating houses and saloons lay out upon the walk, and while she stood peering out the sound of raucous howling and shrill whooping came to her ears with such suggestion of ferocity that she shivered.

A few of the hotel guests had gone to bed, but the women were up, excited and nervous, starting at every fresh outburst of whooping, knowing that their sons or husbands were out in the street "to see the fun" and that they might meet trouble.

At last Lee discerned her mother turning from Halsey's, followed by three men. Withdrawing from the front porch where she had been standing, she reentered the house to meet her mother in the hall. "Where is Mr. Cavanagh?" she asked.

"Out in the dining room. You see, Mike Halsey is a kind of use. He ransomed and left Ross down there alone with his two prisoners and the lights likely to be turned out on him, so I offered the café as a clubhouse. They are sure in for a long and tedious night."

Lee was alarmed at her mother's appearance. "You must go to bed. You look ghastly!"

"I reckon I'd better by down for a little while, but I can't sleep. Ross may need me. There isn't a man to help him but me, and that lawyer Ballard is full of waff. He's got it in for Ross and will make trouble if he can."

"What can we do?"

"Shoot!" replied Lee, with dry brevity. "I wouldn't add a chance to plugging some of the worst citizens of this town. I save them one way."

With this sentence in her ears Lee Virginia went to her bed, but not to slumber. Her utter inability either to control her mother's action or to influence that of the mob added to her uneasiness.

The singing, shouting, tramping of the crowd went on, and once a group of men halted just outside her window, and she heard Nell Ballard noisily, drunkenly arguing as to the most effective method of taking the prisoners.

Ranger

"Come on, boys!" said Ballard, his voice filled with reckless determination. "Let's run him!"

As they passed the girl sprang up and went to her mother's room to warn her of the threatened attack.

Lizie was already awake and calmly loading a second revolver by the light of the electric bulb. A jarring blow was heard. "Hear that? They're breaking in!" said Lizie. She started to leave the room.

Lee stopped her. "Where are you going?"

"To help Ross. Here!" She thrust the handle of a smaller weapon into Lee's hand. "Ed Wetherford's girl ought to be able to take care of herself. Come out!"

With a most unheroic horror numbing her limbs, Lee followed her mother through the hall. The sound of shouts and the tramping of feet could be heard, and she came out into the restaurant just in time to photograph upon her brain a scene whose significance was at once apparent. On a chair between his two prisoners and confronting Ballard at the head of a crowd of focused villains stood the ranger, a gleaming weapon in his hand, a look of resolution on his face.

What he had said or what he intended to do she did not learn, for her mother rushed at the invaders with the mad bravery of a she bear. "Get out of here!" she snarled, thrusting her revolver into the very mouth of the leader.

They all fell back in astonishment and fear.

Ross leaped to her side. "Leave them to me!" he said. "I'll clear the room."

"Not on your life! This is my house. I have the right to smash the fools!" And she bent them over the heads with her pistol barrel.

Recognizing that she was minded to kill, they retreated over the threshold, and Ross, drawing the door close behind them, turned to find Lee Virginia confronting Edwards, who had attempted to escape into the kitchen. The girl's face was white, but the eye of her revolver stared straight and true into her prisoner's face.

With a bound Ross seized him and flung him against the wall. "Get back there!" he shouted. "You must take your medicine with your boss."

The old fellow hurriedly replaced his ragged hat and, folding his arms, sank back into his chair with bowed head, while Lizie turned upon her Gregg.

"What did you go into this kind of deal for? You know what the game laws was, didn't you? Your old dad is all for state regulation, and here you are breaking a state law. Why don't you stand up for the code like a sport?"

Joe, who had been boasting of the smiles he had drawn from Lee, did not relish this tongue lashing from her mother, but, assuming a careless air, he said, "I'm all out of smokes; get me a box, that's a good old son!"

Lizie regarded him with the expression of one nonplused. "You impudent little cub!" she exclaimed. "What you need is a booting!"

The ranger addressed himself to Lee. "I want to thank you for a very opportune intervention. I didn't know you could handle a gun so neatly."

She dashed with pleasure. "Oh, yes, I can shoot. My father taught me when I was only six years old."

As she spoke Ross caught the man Edwards studying them with furtive glance, but upon being observed he resumed his crouching attitude, which concealed his face beneath the rim of his weather worn hat. It was evident that he was afraid of being recognized. He had the shinking air of the convict, and his form, so despairing in its lines, appealed to Lee with even greater poignancy than his face. "I'm sorry," she said to him, "but it was my duty to help Mr. Cavanagh."

He glanced up with a quick sidewise look. "That's all right, miss. I should she called as he produced a bottle, chuckling eagerly, she added, "They say it's poison, but it's my meat to-night." Little remained of the woman in Lizie, and the old sheep her eye eyed her with further curiosity.

"I was afraid you'd shoot," Lizie explained to Ross, "and I didn't want you to miss up your hands on the dictators. I had the right to kill. They were trespassers, and I'd 'n' done it then."

"I don't think they intended to actually assault me," he said, "but it's a bit discouraging to find the town so indifferent over both the breaking of the laws and the deaths of a drunken mob. I'm afraid the worst of them are a long way from law-abiding people yet."

Joe, who did not like the position in which he stood as respecting Lee, here made an offer of aid. "I don't suppose my word is any good," but if you'll let me do it I'll go out and round up Judge Higley. I think I know where he is."

To this Lizie objected. "You can't do that, Ross; you better hold the fort here till morning."

Lee was rather sorry, too, for young Gregg, who bore his buffeting with the imperturbable face of the heroes of his class. He had gone into this enterprise with much the same spirit in which he had stolen gates and misplaced signs during his brief college

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary, C. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass., surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and rechecked by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonymy, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. In size of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

THE re-nomination, by a unanimous vote, of Commissioner of Schools Milford, by the Republican county convention held at Boyer City, Friday, is a merited tribute to competent public official and a source of gratification to the patrons of the schools of Charlevoix county. Mr. Milford has demonstrated during his official life that he is the right man for the place, and, in a large measure, the high standing of the schools of Charlevoix county is due to his hard work. He is an earnest advocate of the teaching of the elements of agriculture and manual training, believing that a trained mind and skillful hand go together in the making up of the all around man and woman. Hardworking, enthusiastic, looking towards the ideals of the future in the education of our boys and girls and not bound up in the traditions of the past, Mr. Milford deserves and will receive a large vote at the April election.

ONE of the most prominent figures in Michigan politics today is Speaker Baker. Elected on a platform wherein he declared for certain things he has insisted upon living up to his platform although his opponents, like a pack of wolves, have howled when he has fought against some of their petty grafts. Out of every contest he has come out the stronger and, next to Governor Osborn, who also has insisted upon carrying out his campaign promises, has endeared himself to the people of Michigan who will insist upon continuing him somewhere in their service.

Knights of the Modern Maccabees Make Excellent Showing.

Unique Features of this Popular Home Beneficial Society.

The annual statement of the Life Benefit Fund of the Knights of the Modern Maccabees, Dec. 31, 1910, makes a very good showing for this popular home beneficial association. The assets total over $600,000, of which upwards of $51,000 is real estate. Its balance in the treasury, after deducting death claims not yet adjusted, is over $492,000.

GEO. S. LOVELACE, Gt. Commander

ter deducting death claims not yet adjusted, is over $492,000. During the year 1910 it paid 1,050 death claims, amounting to $1,392,600; paid disability claims $62,770.35; and paid old-age claims of $107,802.99. Three death claims are resisted and $1 were reported but proofs had not been filed. No claims of any kind in which proofs had been received were unpaid.

Attractive features of the Knights of the Modern Maccabees, many of which are peculiar to this association, are term insurance, whole life insurance, old age annuities, special disability certificates, health and accident certificates. Its rates are based on the National Fraternal Congress Table. An examination of the rates of assessment would indicate that the society does not offer the bait of cheap insurance, which has lured to ruin so many fraternal orders, but offers protection at the lowest rates consistent with safety.

The Knights of the Modern Maccabees, Michigan's own fraternal order, number in their ranks men in every walk of life. The banishment of everything connected with alcoholism from the membership and social functions of the association has made the order exceedingly popular with wives and sweethearts, who appreciate the fact that the social gatherings of the Knights will always conclude with sobriety.

THEATRICAL

Remarkable progress is being shown by the Damon & Pythons cast on their production which will take place at the local theater, Friday, March 10. It is safe to say that Charlevoix has never known a local amateur cast that is in the class of this one, and the play is recognized the world over as the finest of the classics. Mr. Hampton, bringing familiar with every K of P lodge in the state, has arranged for the finest and most beautiful costumes only, as he says, there is nothing too good for Charlevoix and this play must be dressed "to a finish."

The principal characters of the play are in the hands of Messrs. Hampton, Paddock, Fitch, Griffin, Hammond, Smith and Miller and the Misses Mayne and Mildred Johnson. Rehearsals are being held each evening and the manner in which the cast is working is a guarantee that the performance will be a record breaker.

"What Happened to Smith," the senior play, will be up to the high standard set by the senior plays in previous years. The members of the cast are taking hold with a vim and spirit that has never been excelled and will offer to you on March 22 a finished production.

The best home talent production ever seen in the city was the verdict of the good sized audience that attended the hand benefit Friday night. Everybody connected with the play made a success—manager, chorus and all. The best feature was that it was a financial success, the band receiving a substantial sum.

DEATH LIST SMALLER

In Railroad Accidents for the Year Just Ended
December 31, 1910.

The steam electric railroads of the state killed 253 persons during 1910 and injured 3,285. Of this number but 33 were passengers, and 21 of these are credited to the electric lines, while the steam roads killed 12. These figures are taken from the records in the office of the state railroad commission.

The Detroit United railway of Detroit is credited with having killed a greater number of passengers than any other steam or electric line in the state, being credited with 12.

The steam roads are credited with the following: Grand Trunk, eight; Pere Marquette, three; Chicago, Kalamazoo and Saginaw, one; electric lines: Michigan United railway, six; D. J. & C. two; Rapid Railway, one. Of the injured passengers the Detroit United railway again takes a prominent lead, for out of a total of 1,250 passengers injured on electric lines during the year, 1,194 of the accidents happened to passengers riding on the Detroit United lines. Sixty-eight passengers were injured on the Michigan United; D. J. & C., forty; and the Rapid Railway thirty-seven. The steam roads are credited with having injured only 181 passengers during the year, as follows: Pere Marquette, 53; Michigan Central, 31; Grand Rapids & Indiana, 38. The other injured are distributed among the several of the smaller roads.

The death rate for the last year was 81 less than 1909. The first injured was 704 higher.

Roads Need Attention.

Perhaps nothing has been exploited to a greater extent than the King road drag, and perhaps there is no impediment that is more generally neglected. Whether past experience shows that the road drag is not the useful and valuable implement its champions would have us believe or whether it is simply neglecting the use of a good thing is not apparent, but the result is the same. The roads need attention and they need it more frequently than they get it. If the road drag is not the thing then something else should be used. But use something.

High freight rates are not nearly as heavy a tax on the shippers of stock and other farm produce as bad roads are.

Tar on Roads Disinfects.

Medical authorities have announced that in addition to its dust laying qualities a tar preparation is highly beneficial to the community using it on its roads, owing to its disinfectant properties. According to the health authorities of Battersea, England, infant mortality has largely decreased in that populous district since its streets were surfaced with tar macadam.

JOINING A BOAT DECK.

How to Make Seams Water Tight Without Calking.

A boat deck is more exposed to severe attacks of the elements than any other part of the boat. The hot sunbake may be drying it up half the time, while during the other half it may be covered with rain, dew or salt water. And on this account the majority of boat builders calk the seams, which does not make as pretty a deck as a tight seam made in the following manner:

Have the wood thoroughly seasoned and make a new fitting joint for the deck plank that you are laying next to the plank short. When this is done take the plank out and with a smooth steel rod or brush of some kind burnish down with quite a pressure the corner of the jointed edge. This, of course, compresses the wood. Now plane the wood down on the jointed edge, making a true corner again. This is now ready to fasten on the deck carlins, covered in the manner with the rest of the deck planks.

The joints on a wooden tank or vat can be made tight by the same principle. Instead of burnishing the corner a round rod is laid in the corner of the jointed plank and with a hammer is forced nearly half its diameter in the wood. This is planed down until there is no groove left. Each joint is treated in the same way. When the wood is planed the part that has been compressed by the round rod will expand. This produces a very tight joint.

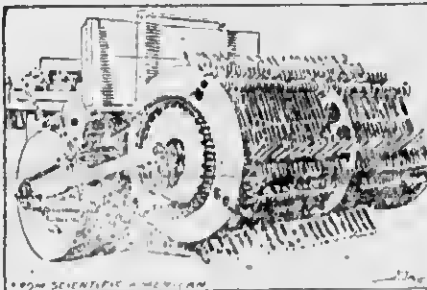

MOTOR DRIVEN PLOW.

Overcomes Many of the Faults of Similar Machines.

Traction engines meeting the requirements of small farmers were brought out by English and American manufacturers. They allowed the use of two, three or more furrow plows attached to them and working under the direction of one or two men only.

In spite of all the remarkable service done by such machines under favorable conditions they are ineffective in hard ground because of the engine not having traction effort enough to pull the plows with added weight put on them, while in soft ground this same weight causes the machines to sink in the field.

This is the reason why even now, although the use of motor driven implements for plowing is by no means a general one, as it could be made, and why a machine avoiding the above mentioned fundamental disadvantages would meet a very great success. So far the only machine fulfilling all the requirements of a motor driven cultivator is the universal agricultural tractor put on the market recently at Zurich, Switzerland. This machine was brought out after two years' construction.

MOTOR DRIVEN PLOW AND CULTIVATOR.

After experimenting and testing and receiving the unanimous approbation and admiration of Swiss and foreign farmers who had to witness a demonstration given before the Swiss Agricultural society in April last at Zurich. The secret of its success lies in the fact that in this machine the problem of assemblage, hitherto met on the plow by the use of several rows of feet fixed on a revolving drum which is fastened at the rear of a wagon and driven by any kind of motor, which at the same time propels the vehicle. Such a combination permits to use a strip of great length to any depth desired with the minimum of energy necessary, because the car, instead of meeting resistance to its movement, works itself forward by the action of the drum and hoos. For this reason the car itself can be made very light and requires a comparatively small motor, whereas it leaves the field thoroughly worked to any depth required, ready for sowing. This machine is worked by one man.

Each machine is supplied with a number of sets of tools varying according to their application.

Mistletoe a Menace.

Few people who know anything only as a desirable feature of Christmas decorations understand that the plant is a parasite dangerous to the life of trees in the regions in which it grows. It is only a question of time after mistletoe once begins to grow upon a tree before the tree itself will be killed. The parasite saps the life of the tree in its branches. Fortunately it is of slow growth, taking years to develop to large proportions, but when neglected it inevitably ruins all trees it reaches. The only method of extermination is the cutting down of diseased trees.

Cleaning Gauge Glasses.

Close the upper and lower valves and open the pet-cock to empty the gauge glass of water. Hold a cup or other suitable receptacle containing muriatic acid of ordinary strength under the pet-cock. Open the lower valve sufficiently to cause the acid to be drawn to the top of the glass. The alternate opening of the lower and upper valve causes the acid to be drawn up and repeated. Two or three applications will clean a dirty glass thoroughly. Clean the gauges.

A campaign for the purpose of interesting former Michigan people in the fact that western Michigan is now developing with a rapidity that is truly surprising, has been inaugurated. The bureau wants the names and present addresses of former farmers and fruit growers, especially those who have gone to the south and the west. Even if these individuals do not desire to return they will be loyal enough to say a good word for their old home. It is the Bureau's purpose to occasionally send them illustrated Western Michigan booklets and magazines.

John Fitch, one of the big fruit growers of Riverston township, Mason county, has invented a gasoline machine for doing the heavy work upon his farm. A 20 horse power engine is mounted on a truck with wide wheels and connections are made to the rear wheels so that the truck can be forced ahead or backwards, and so that one wheel can be made to go one way and the other wheel the other, making it possible to turn corners. The machine will draw behind it, the plows, harrows and other implements Mr. Fitch desires to use. This is the first instance in this section of using power machinery for field work.

career, and he was now disposed (in the presence of a pretty girl) to carry it out with undiminished impudence. "It only means a fine, anyway," he assured himself.

Cavanagh did not trust Gregg, either, and as this was the first time he had been called upon to arrest men for killing game out of season he could not afford to fall of any precaution. Tired and sleepy as he was, he must remain on guard. "You and your daughter must go to bed at once," he urged.

Lize, under the spur of her dream, talked on with bitter boldness, bearing the town and its people. Gregg listened to her with expressionless visage, his eyes dreamily fixed on Lee's face, but his companion, the old bird, seemed to palpitate with shame and fear. And Ross had the feeling at the moment that in this ragged, unkempt old hobo was the skeleton of one of the old time heroes. He was wasted with drink and worn by wind and rain, but he was very far from being commonplace.

CHAPTER XII.

THE LAW STEPS IN.

"HERE they come again!" called Lize as the busy feet along the walk threatened another attack. Ross Cavanagh again, drew his revolver and stood at guard, and Lize, recovering her own weapon, took a place by his side.

With the strength of a bear the new assailant shook the bolted door. "Let me in!" he roared.

"It's dead!" called young Gregg. "Go away, you chump!"

"Let me in or I'll smash this door!" retorted Gregg.

"You smash that door, old Bullfrog," announced Lize, "and I'll carry one of your lungs away. If you want to get in here you must go through the judge of this town and the constable."

The old hunter muttered a fierce curse, while Ross explained the situation. "I'm as eager to get rid of these culprits as any one can be, but they must be taken by proper authority. Bring a writ from the magistrate and you may have them and welcome."

Gregg went away without further word, and Lize said: "He'll find Hilkey if he's in town and he is in town, for I saw him this afternoon. He's hiding out to save himself trouble."

Lee Virginia, without understanding of what the ranger had endured, asked: "Can't I get you something to eat? Would you like some coffee?"

"I would indeed," he answered, and his face pleased her.

She hurried away to get it, while Cavanagh disposed his prisoners. He had a couple of tables in the corner. "I guess you're in for a night of it," he remarked grimly, "so make yourselves as comfortable as you can. Perhaps your experience may be a discouragement to others of your kind."

Lee returned soon with a pot of fresh coffee and some sandwiches, the sight of which roused young Gregg to the impudent remark: "Well, notice that! And we're left out!" But Ed's words struck into the shadow, as if the light had been there.

Ross thanked Lee formally, but there was more than gratitude in his glance, and she turned away to hide her face from other eyes. Strange place it was for the blooming of love's roses, but they were in her cheeks as she faced her mother and Lize with fresh acknowledgment of her beauty. "Well, this settles it. I'm going to get out of this town, dearie. I'm done. This ends the cattle country for me. I ought to have turned you back the day you landed here."

The feet halted. A sharp rap sounded on the door.

"Who's there?" demanded Lize. "The law!" replied a wheezy voice. "Open in the name of the law!"

"It's old Hilkey," announced Lize. "Come in, Ross."

"Come in, law," she called impudently as the justice appeared. "You look kind of nice, but you're all the law this blue town can sport. Come in and do your duty."

Hilkey, a tall man with a rusty brown beard, very much on his dignity entered the room, followed by a short, bullet-headed citizen in a rumpled blue suit with a big snuff on his breast. Behind on the sidewalk Ballard and a dozen of his gang could be seen. Sam Gregg, the moving cause of this resurrection of law and order, followed the constable. Hilkey opened upon Cavanagh. "Well, sir, what's all this row? What's your charge against these men?"

"Killing mountain sheep. I caught them with the head of a big ram upon their pack."

"Make him show his commission," shouted Gregg. "He's never been commissioned. He's no game warden."

Hilkey beamed. "An oh, his authority is all right, Sam. I've seen it. If he can prove that those men killed the sheep we'll have to act."

Cavanagh briefly related how he had captured the men on the trail. "The head of the ram is at the livery barn with my horse."

"How about that?" asked Hilkey, turning to Joe.

"I guess that's right," replied the innocent youth. "We killed the sheep all right."

Hilkey was in a corner. He didn't like to offend Cavanagh, and yet the case was plain. He met the issue blandly. "Marshall, take these men into custody. Then to Ross: 'We'll relieve you of your cure, Mr. Cavanagh. You may appear tomorrow at 9.'"

It was a farcical selling to a very audacious thirty-six hour campaign, and Ross, feeling like a man who, having rolled a huge stone to the top of a hill, has been ordered to drop it, said: "I insist on the maximum penalty of the law, Justice Hilkey, especially for this man!" He indicated Joe Gregg.

"No more sneaking, Hilkey," added Lize, uttering her distrust in that phrase. "You put these men through or I'll make you trouble."

Hilkey turned and with unsteady solemnity saluted. "Fear not my government, madam," said he and so made exit.

After the door had closed behind them Cavanagh bitterly complained. "I've delivered my prisoners over into the hands of their friends. I feel like a fool. What assurance have I that they will ever be punished?"

"You have Hilkey's word," retorted Lize, with ironic reflection. "He'll fine 'em as much as $10 apiece and confiscate the head, which is worth fifty."

"No matter what happens now, you've done your duty," added Lee Virginia with intent to comfort him.

Lize, now that the stress of the battle was over, felt a tremble. "I reckon I'll have to go to bed," she admitted. "I'm all in. This night service is wearing."

She did indeed resemble the wreck of a woman as she lay out upon her bed, her hands reaching, her eyes closed, and Ross was profoundly alarmed. "You need the doctor," he urged. "Let me bring him."

"No," she said huskily, but with decision. "I'm only tired. I'll be all right soon. Send the people away. Tell 'em to go to bed."

For half an hour Cavanagh remained in the room waiting to see if the doctor's services would be required, but at the end of that time, as she had apparently fallen asleep, he rose and slipped out into the hall.

Lee followed, and they faced each other in such intimacy as the shipwrecked feel after the rescue.

When they were quite alone Lee said: "You must not go out into the streets tonight."

"There's no danger. Those hoodlums would not dare to attack me."

"Nevertheless you shall not go," she declared. "Wait a moment," she commanded and re-entered her mother's room.

As he stood there at Lize's whisper, Ross's door and his mind went back over her brave deed, which had gone far to atone for her vagrancy, his respect for her deepened. Lee Virginia opened the door and stepped out close beside him.

"Her breathing is quieter," she whispered. "I think she's going to sleep. It's been a terrible night! You must be terribly tired. I will find you some place to sleep. Please don't go till after breakfast," she smiled wilyly. "I may need you."

He understood. "What did the doctor say?"

"He said mother was in a very low state of vitality and that she must be very careful, which was easy enough to say. But how can I get her to rest and to sleep? You have seen how little she cares for the doctor's orders. He told her not to touch alcohol."

"She is more like a man than a woman," he answered.

She led the way into the small, stilling room, which lay at the front of the house and directly opposite the door of her own room. It was filled with shabby parlor furniture, and in one corner stood a worn couch. "I'm sorry, but I can offer nothing better," she said. "Every bed is taken, but I have plenty of blankets."

There was something delightfully suggestive in being thus waited upon by a young and handsome woman, and the ranger submitted to it with the awkward grace of one unaccustomed to feminine care.

They faced each other in silence, each filled with the same delicious sense of weakness, of danger, reluctant to say good night, longing for the closer touch which slaving love demands, and yet something in the girl defused her, defeated him.

"You must call me if I can be of any help," he repeated, and his voice was tremulous with feeling.

"I will do so," she answered. Still they did not part. His voice was very tender as he said: "I don't like to see you exposed in such experiences. It angers me to think that the worst of these loafers, these drunken beasts, can glare at you, can speak to you. They have no right to breathe the same air with one like you."

She did not smile at this. His voice, his eyes, were filled with the gravity of the lover whose passion is not humorous. Against his training, his judgment, he was being drawn into closer and closer union with this daughter of violence, and he added, "You may not see me in the morning."

"You must not go without seeing my mother. You must have your breakfast with us. It hurt us to think you didn't come to us for supper."

Her words meant little, but the look in her eyes, the music in her voice, made him shiver. He stammered: "I must return to my duties tomorrow. I should go back tonight."

"You mustn't do that. You can't do that. You are to appear before the judge."

He smiled. "That is true. I'd forgotten that."

Radiant with relief, she extended her hand. "Good night, then. You must sleep."

He took her hand and drew her toward him, then, perceiving both won, her hand in her eyes, he conquered himself. "Good night," he repeated, dropping her hand, but his voice was husky with his passion.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE OLD SHEEP HERDER.

THE ranger was awakened in the first faint dawn by the passing of the girl's light feet as she went across the hall to her mother's room, and a moment later he heard the low murmur of her voice. Throwing off his blankets and making such scant toilet as he needed, he stepped into the hall and waited for her to return.

Soon she came toward him, a smile of confidence and pleasure on her lips. "How is she?" he asked.

"Quite comfortable."

"And you?" His voice was very tender.

"I am a little tired," she acknowledged. "I didn't sleep very well."

"You didn't sleep at all," he declared regretfully.

"Oh, yes, I did," she replied brightly. "These two ardent sons confounded each other in absorbed silence with keener perception, with new daring, with new intimacy, till he recalled himself with effort. "You must let me help you if there's anything I can do. Remember, I'm your big brother."

"I remember," she answered smilingly. "And I'm going out to see what my big brother is to have for breakfast."

Cavanagh found the street empty, silent and utterly commonplace. He went forth to his duties with a deepened conviction of the essential lawlessness of the state and of America in general, for this spirit of mob law was to be found in some form throughout the land. He was disgusted, but not beaten. His resolution to carry out the terms of his contract with the government remained unshaken.

He carried with him also a final dispiriting glimpse of Eliza Werber's girl that did indeed threaten his peace of mind. There was an involuntary appeal, a wistful depth, to her glance which awakened in him an indignant pity and also blew into flame something not so creditable—some thing which smoldered beneath his conscious will. She had not escaped her heritage of passion, and her glances, innocent as they were, roused even in him something lawless.

His body padded slowly, and the afternoon was half spent before he came in sight of the long, low log cabin in which was the only home he possessed in all America. For the first time since he built the station seemed lonely and desolate.

Would any woman for love at all come to such a heartless home? he asked himself. "And if she consented to do so, could I be so selfish as to exact such sacrifice? No; the forest ranger in these latitudes must be young and heart free; otherwise his life would be miserably solitary."

He was just dishing out his rude supper when the feet of a horse on the log bridge announced a visitor.

With a feeling of pleasure as well as relief he rose to greet the stranger. "Any visitor is welcome this night," he said.

The horseman proved to be his former prisoner, the old man Edwards, who slipped from his saddle with the never failing grace of the cow man and came slowly toward the cabin. He smiled wearily as he said: "I'm on your trail, Mr. Ranger, but I bear no malice. We were doing your duty. Can you tell me how far it is to Ambro's camp?"

There was something forlorn in the man's attitude, and Cavanagh's heart softened. "Turn your horse into the corral and come to supper," he commanded with western bluntness.

"Well, talk about all that later," Edwards accepted his hospitality without hesitation. "I'm going up to Ambro's place," he began after a few minutes of silent eating. "Know where his camp is?"

"I do," replied Ross, to whom the stranger now appeared in pathetic guise. "Any man of his age consenting to herd sheep is surely hard hit by the rough hand of the world," he reasoned, and the closer he studied his visitor the plainer he felt his ungoverned past.

WHAT INTERESTS OF MICHIGAN

PICKLES AND SAUCES
On this item, as on confectionery, the United States is to receive the benefit of Canada's intermediate rate of 32½ per cent, in place of paying 35 per cent duty as formerly. We sold the Dominion $80,000 worth of pickles, sauces, etc., during the year ended March 31, 1910. Under the heading "pickles, sauces and preserves" the 10th Census of Manufactures estimates Michigan's production at $2,000,000.

MEAT AND MEAT PRODUCTS
Under the reciprocal legislation both countries will renounce all duties on live animals. Under the Payne tariff food animals are taxed at various specific rates upon entry into the United States, the ad valorem equivalents ranging from 20 to 30 per cent ad valorem. Under these rates we imported during the year ending June 30, 1910, approximately $800,000 worth of these animals from Canada and the magnitude of the Canadian supply upon which the American consumer may now draw without restriction is shown by the fact that the Dominion is able to export about $11,500,000 worth of food animals annually.

The animal rate on meats of all kinds will be 14 cent per pound under the agreement. At present our rates on meats range from 12 per pound on fresh meats up to 4 cents a pound on bacon and hams, 25 per cent on other meats (salted, smoked, etc.).

ROUGH LUMBER
It is proposed to admit lumber into the United States free of duty all lumber from Canada not further manufactured than sawed. On planed or finished lumber the rates will be reduced. From having held first place among the lumber producing states in 1900 Michigan had in 1908 fallen to sixth place, producing less than 1,500,000 M feet. On the other hand her furniture and planing and finishing mill industries have prospered. The furniture manufacturers should profit considerably by obtaining hard-wood lumber to some extent from Canada more cheaply, while free raw material will compensate the planing and finishing mills for the reduced duties on their products.

GRAIN AND FLOCK
It is proposed to allow Canadian wheat and other grain free entry into this country. At present wheat is dutiable at 25 cents per bushel, oats at 15 cents per bushel, barley at 30 cents per bushel and rye at 10 cents per bushel.

STAVES AND STAVE BOLTS
Of interest to the flour mills and numerous other industries is the proposal to admit staves and stave bolts free of duty. Staves have hitherto been dutiable at 10 per cent, and stave bolts at 20 per cent, and during the fiscal year the United States imported almost precisely $1,000,000 worth from Canada.

CONFECTIONERY
Under the pending agreement Canada gives to this country her intermediate rate on confectionery sweet pastry, etc., lowering the duty from 35 to 32½ per cent. She imported from this country in Canada fiscal year 1910, $131,000 worth of the above articles, taxing it $46,000. Michigan's output of confectionery in 1904 was valued at nearly $2,100,000.

SALT
It is proposed to make salt mutually duty-free. At present Canada taxes it at 7½ or 5 cents per 100 pounds according to whether it is in bulk or in packages. Her imports of both kinds of salt amounted to $52,000 in the fiscal year 1910, and were taxed nearly $20,000. In 1908 Michigan headed the list of salt producing states, her output being valued at nearly $2,500,000.

PEOPLE WE KNOW

They are Charlevoix People, and What They Say is of Local Interest.

When an incident like the following occurs right here at home, it is bound to carry weight with our readers. So many strange occurrences go the rounds of the press, are published as facts, people become skeptical. On one subject skepticism is rapidly disappearing. This is due to the actual experience of our citizens, and their public utterances regarding them. The doubter must doubt no more in the face of such evidence as this. The public statement of a reputable citizen living right at home, one whom you can see every day, leaves no ground for the skeptic to stand on.

JUDGE MAYNE

IS THE CHOICE

Of the Republicans of This Judicial Circuit

DEFEATS E. N. CLINK IN THE PRIMARY

By Approximately Twelve Hundred Majority

Mr. Clink Received Splendid Endorsement in His Home Precinct—Remarkably Small Vote Cast Everywhere.

At the first state wide primary election ever held in Michigan for the nomination of circuit judges every judge, with the exception of two, that were candidates for nomination were successful, defeating their opponents by a large majority.

In this circuit, Judge Mayne of this city defeated Elisha N. Clink of East Jordan by a majority approximately 1,200, carrying nearly every precinct in the circuit. The feature of the contest was the remarkably small vote cast, proving that the people were perfectly satisfied with the service Judge Mayne has given them in the past twelve years and when a public servant has faithfully served the people they will not turn him down.

Both candidates put an energetic campaign which was clean throughout and both had the satisfaction of being heartily endorsed by the people in their own homes. Judge Mayne carrying Charlevoix city by 220 out of a total vote of 262 and Mr. Clink carrying South Arm by 133 out of a total of 263.

HUNTING-WIVES

Washington State Man Going to Germany for Cargo of Helpmeets.

Eugene Beck, a bonanza wheat rancher in the Big Bend district, Washington, sailed for Luxembourg on the good ship Amerika, leaving New York on March 2, returning in April with a bevy of young German women, whose sweethearts are farming in eastern Washington. While arranging for steamship tickets and railroad transportation for the party Beck mentioned that helpmeets for the German farmers in the Big Bend country are in demand, adding that when he spoke of going back to the latherland on a visit more than a dozen bachelors begged him to find wives for them. Beck intimated he will marry the girl of his choice while abroad. The bachelors, who are counting the days when Mr. and Mrs. Beck will return to Washington with the party of German girls, are preparing an elaborate reception and entertainment, at which it is expected the engagements of forty couples will be publicly announced.

MICHIGAN LEADS THE UNION

In the Production of Sugar Manufactured From Beets

OVER THIRTY-FIVE THOUSAND FARMERS

Engaged in the Culture of Beets in Michigan

For Which They Received Over Seven Million Dollars—A Never Failing Source of Revenue to Producers.

The beet sugar campaign for 1910 is ended, the last of the seventeen factories operated during the campaign having closed down last. The campaign will go on record as the most successful in all respects in the history of the industry in Michigan to date.

Not only was the acreage larger but climatic conditions were particularly favorable and the acreage of both beet and sugar yield, exceeding any previous year.

Thirty-five thousand farmers in Michigan grew beets last season. The number of farmers growing beets and the acreage were both materially increased. Michigan beet growers harvested 1,150,000 tons of beets in the last campaign.

The beet growers received from the sugar companies in Michigan for their beets the enormous aggregate of $7,000,000 in cash. They did not have to grow their beets and hold them when harvested because of the market fluctuations. They knew when the beets reached the factory what the price would be for the price was fixed when the acreage contracts were signed up last spring. They incurred no risk as that of the climate.

A good season meant a good crop and a good lot of money. There is an crop grown on the farm so certain of remunerative result as that of beets.

Thousand of beet growers not only in Michigan but elsewhere will bear evidence to the accuracy of this assertion. The average yield of beets in Michigan last season was a fraction less than twelve tons to the acre, an increase of approximately three tons per acre compared with the yield of any previous year. Michigan beet growers are every year becoming more and more expert in the matter of growing beets to perfection. It has taken Germany 50 years to reach the position of being the greatest beet sugar country in the world, but no country on earth can compare with what has been accomplished here in less than 15 years. Given the protection it should have the home industry would beat the world in ten years in the production of beet sugar.

Hay Making in Western Michigan.

The production of the Michigan beet sugar factories in the campaign just closed aggregated 290,000,000 pounds of sugar, an increase of 30 per cent compared with that of previous years.

For each of these factories $75,000 is expended in labor in the fields.

Labor in the factory during the campaign costs each plant $50,000.

For each plant there is expended $6,000 for barrels for packing sugar and $3,000 for bags, a considerable portion of the output now being handled in bags.

The cost of coal and other necessities, supplies averages $25,000 for each factory during the campaign. The average number of men employed at each plant during the four months campaign is 300.

The pulp is dried, baled and shipped largely to the south where it has become a popular feed for cattle and hogs.

Michigan railroads received as their share in this great industry nearly $1,000,000 the last campaign in payment of freight for beets, supplies hauled to the factories and sugar hauling to market.

The chief beneficiaries of this marvelous Michigan industry are the farmers who grow the beets and the consumers of the sugar.

The average cost of granulated sugar in the market is one-third of a cent less than it was one year ago. Much as has and is being said regarding the increased cost of living, sugar is one of the very few commodities of universal domestic consumption that has not increased in price.

In 1870 the average market wholesale price in New York for refined sugar was 13.51 cents a pound. In 1880 it had dropped to 9.80 cents a pound. In 1890 the average price was 6.27 cents a pound.

Although the per capita consumption of sugar had increased from 36.30 pounds in 1870 to 81.18 pounds in 1890, the average wholesale in New York dropped from 13.51 cents to 4.76 cents a pound.

The total consumption of sugar in the United States in 1910 aggregated 3,350,355 long tons, an increase of 92,003 tons compared with the previous year.

The beet sugar industry of the United States has saved the consumers of sugar millions of dollars every year. But for the home production of sugar the importers of foreign cane sugar could fix their own price for the commodity and soak the consumer.

But the beet sugar is a brake upon the foreigner and there is enough of it to hold down the foreign commodity.

This immortal fact should be appreciated by the American sugar consumers, and congress and the government instead of playing into the hands of the cane sugar importers and refiners, should in every way promote and encourage the home industry.

Michigan sugar companies report that farmers are signing up acreage to grow beets for next season delivery more rapidly than they had up to date a year ago. This is commendable. It is to the permanent advantage of every farmer to grow beets and the sooner contracts for acreage are signed the sooner the factory officials will be able to formulate plans for the campaign.

"Walk up and sign up," is the slogan.

DEMOCRATS MEET

State Convention Held at Muskegon Last Week.

Platform Adopted and Full List of Candidates are Named.

At the Democratic convention held at Muskegon last week a platform was adopted and nominations made as follows:

It reiterates the democratic state platform adopted at Kalamazoo in 1910.

Says condemnation of the Payne-McLure tariff was ratified at the polls, deposing the republican majority in the lower house of the national congress for violation of party pledges, etc.

Congratulates Michigan on breaking its republican delegation in congress by electing such able men as Frank R. Doremus of Detroit and Edwin F. Sweet of Grand Rapids.

Says the republican party is trying to recover its equilibrium by advocating reciprocity with Canada and though the effort is only a partial success, democratic congressmen are endorsed for voting for it; further, the next congress with its democratic majority, is the remaining hope for such downward revision as will be equitable to all the people.

Advocates the initiative, referendum and recall.

Criticizes Governor Osborn and his two months administration and the republican legislature at Lansing for its inactivity.

Declares existence of political corruption in state affairs and insists that nothing but democratic control can correct it.

Commends the nominees of the day to the voters of the state as men pledged to honest reform in state affairs.

The candidates nominated are as follows:

For supreme court justice—John E. Kinnane of Bay City, Herbert A. Saurborn of Mt. Pleasant.

Big Collection of Photographs.

The western Michigan photographic collection now consists of approximately 1400 different scenes. These are orchard, farm, city, and village views from all parts of the western Michigan territory. There are in the collection from every one of the 29 counties making up the territory covered by the western Michigan Development Bureau. The bureau has been at work for two years collecting the pictures and securing the data that makes the collection of more than ordinary value. The pictures are used in the illustrating of the magazines, booklets and leaflets issued in behalf of the advertisement of western Michigan and for the purpose of illustrating magazine and newspaper articles with "Western Michigan" as the theme.

REPUBLICANS NAME STATE TICKET

In Convention Held at Saginaw Last Thursday

ALL OFFICERS ARE RENOMINATED

New Names are Hanchett, Nadal, Beaumont and Woodman

Governor Osborn Makes Brilliant Speech—Taft and Osborn are Endorsed—Leading Questions are Dodged.

For Justice of the Supreme Court—Russell C. Ostrander, Lansing; John E. Bird, Adrian.

For Regents of the U. of M.—Benjamin S. Hanchett, Grand Rapids; Lucius L. Hubbard, Houghton.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction—Luther L. Wright, Ironwood.

For Members State Board of Education—Thomas W. Nadal, Olivet.

For Member State Board of Agriculture—John W. Beaumont, Detroit; Jason Woodman, Paw Paw.

The Republican convention at Saginaw convened Thursday and was attended by delegates from every county in the state except Mackinaw, there being 1,302 delegates present.

Everything passed off in harmonious manner, the ticket being named unanimously. Governor Osborn made a brilliant speech to the convention in which he made an attack on the United States senate for its action in the Lorimer case. He also made a plea for reciprocity.

The government said in part: "You may justly disagree on matters of legislation, in purposes and methods, upon men and measures, but never upon matters of honor and honesty. In this connection I refer particularly to the Lorimer case, which we hear was decided in favor of the United States senator from Illinois."

I regret that the United States senate has so far infringed upon its own dignity by permitting Mr. Lorimer to remain as a member of that distinguished body and justifies his presence in congress on technicalities. A public man should depart himself with perfect propriety so that the breath of suspicion cannot attach to him.

"Mr. Lorimer would not be able to hold his seat in the United States senate, an hour if he had to look to the people of the state of Michigan. It is a shame and disgrace and hastens the day when the people will elect United States senators by direct vote."

"I favor the ratification of the treaty, not so much for reasons of economy or for financial results, but because by it we are building for the future. No lasting edifice"

PRESIDENT CALLS

EXTRA SESSION

Of Congress to Pass Reciprocity Bill

Called to Convene April 4, 1911

Will be First Democratic Congress in Sixteen Years.

What Has Been Accomplished During the Past Two Years—Much Work Left Undone the Present Session.

The sixty-first congress ended last Saturday and President Taft immediately called a special session of congress to convene April 4 to act on the Canadian reciprocity measure.

The following are the most important enactments of the session just past and the measures which failed:

Provisions of three million dollars for the fortifications of the Panama canal.

Provisions for two new battleships.

Reorganization of the judicial code.

Creation of forest preserves in the southern Appalachian and White mountains.

Provision for the construction of embassy and legation buildings abroad.

Requiring inspection of boilers.

Failure of the effort to insert William Lorimer as senator from Illinois.

Failure of the Canadian reciprocity agreement, causing the certainty of an extra session.

Failure of the permanent tariff board bill.

Failure of a resolution to admit to statehood Arizona and New Mexico.

Failure of proposal to increase magazine postage rates, but a commission was provided to investigate the subject.

Failure of a resolution providing for direct election of United States senators.

Failure of a general age pension bill.

Failure to act on the Hallinger-Pinchot investigation reports.

Failure to enact an ocean mail subsidy bill, passed by the senate alone.

Aside from the legislative accomplishments of the sixty-first congress, the two years of the Taft administration have been marked with incidents that will go down in history.

A Democratic house has succeeded a Republican majority for the first time in sixteen years.

A new non-partisan movement for clean government, for and by the people without a party boss, has had its inception and growth.

A bitter squabble on conservation of natural resources resulted in serious charges against Secretary of the Interior Ballinger, discharge of Chief Forester Pinchot and two of his associates, and a "whitewash" of Ballinger by a joint congressional committee.

Four new members, a new chief justice, were named for the supreme court of the United States.

Two of the big trust busting suits to test the Sherman anti-trust law, begun in the Roosevelt administration, were carried through the courts to the supreme tribunal.

A new program of economy in governmental finances was instituted.

The attempt on the part of the government to sue a New York newspaper for libel failed.

Suits under the Sherman anti-trust law were begun against the following combines:

The beet trust, the bathink trust, window glass trust, divided in favor of the government; cotton trust, great lakes towing company, sugar trust (victory for government), southern wholesale grocers combine, night-riders in Kentucky, won by the government; butter and egg trust, kick trust, and electrical trust.

A general movement on the part of the railroads to decrease their freight rates were blocked by the interstate commerce commission.

The rates on Pullman sleeping rates were reduced by order of the commission.

Since his inauguration, President Taft has travelled approximately 25,000 miles, a new mark for presidential journeying.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger
The Great Conservation Novel
By HAMLIN GARLAND
Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

"I suppose Gregg paid your fine?" he said.

"Yes."

"In any other town in the state you'd have gone down the line."

He roused himself. "See here, Mr. Ranger, you've no warrant to believe me, but I told you the truth—Young Gregg got me to ride into the range and show him the trail. I didn't intend to get mixed up with a game warden. I've had all the confinement I need."

"Well, it's a closed incident now," interposed Ross. "We won't reopen it. Make yourself at home."

The stranger, hungry as he was, ate with unexpected gentility, and as the hot coffee sent its cheerful glow through his body he asked, with living interest, a good many questions about the ranger and the forest service.

"You fellows have to be all round men. The cowboys think you have a snip, but I guess you earn your money."

"A man that builds trails, lays bridges, lumps brush, rights fire, rides the roundup and covers seventy-five miles of trail every week on $50 per month and feeds himself and his horses isn't what I would call enjoying a soft snap."

"What do you do it for?"

"God knows! I've been asking myself that question all day today."

"This playing game warden has some out too. That was a wild crowd last night! The town is the same old hole it was when I knew it years ago. Fine girl of Lize Wetherford's. Lize has changed terribly. I didn't expect to see her have such a skin of silk as that girl. She sure looks the queen to me."

Cavanagh did not greatly relish this line of conversation, but the pause enabled him to say, "Miss Wetherford is not much wiser; she got her training in the east. She's been with an aunt ever since her father's death."

"He's dead, is he?"

"So far as anybody knows, he is."

"Well, he's no loss. I knew him too. He was all kinds of a fool. He got on the wrong side of the rustler line-up. Them Wetherford women think a whole lot of you. 'Pears like they'd both fight for you. Are you sweet on the girl?"

"Now, see here, old man," Ross retorted sharply. "You want to do a lot of thinking before you comment on Miss Wetherford. I won't stand for any nasty crack."

Edwards meekly answered, "I wasn't going to say anything out of the way. I was fixing for to praise her."

"All the same, I don't intend to discuss her with you," was Cavanagh's curt answer.

The hyder fell back into silence while the ranger prepared his lunch for the night. The fact that he transferred some of the blankets from his own bed to that of his visitor did not escape Edwards' keen eyes, and with grateful intent he said:

"I can give you a tip, Mr. Ranger," said he, breaking out of a silence. "The triangle outfit is holding more cattle on the forest than their permits call for."

"How do you know?"

"I heard one of the boys bragging about it."

"Much obliged," responded Ross. "I'll look into it."

Edwards went on: "Furthermore, they're fixing for another sheep kill over there too. All the sheepmen are armed. That's why I left the country. I don't want to run any more chances of being shot up. I've had enough of trouble. I can't afford to be hounded by judges and juries. I'm just a broken down old cowpuncher herding sheep in order to keep clear of the liquor belt."

This seemed reasonable, and the ranger remarked by way of dropping the subject: "I've nothing to say further than this—oh yes the rules of the forest and you won't get into any further trouble with me. And as for being shot up by the cowmen, you'll not be disturbed on any national forest. There never has been a single herder shot nor a sheep destroyed on this forest."

"I'm mighty glad to hear that," replied Edwards, with sincere relief. "I've had my share of shooting up and shooting down. All I ask now is quiet and the society of sheep. I take a kind of pleasure in protecting the fool brutes. It's about all I'm good for."

He did indeed look like a man in the final year of life as he spoke. "Better turn in," Cavanagh said in kindly tone. "I'm an early riser."

The old fellow rose stiffly and, laying aside his boots and trousers, rolled into his bunk and was asleep in three minutes.

Cavanagh himself was very tired and went to bed soon after to sleep dreamlessly till daylight. He sprang from his bed and after a plunge in the stream set about breakfast, while Edwards rose from his bunk grumbling and sighing and went forth to wrangle the horses, rubbing his hands and shivering as he met the keen edge of the mountain wind. When he returned breakfast was ready, and again he expressed his gratitude.

"Haven't you any slicker?" asked Cavanagh. "It looks like rain."

"No! I'm run down pretty low," he replied. "The truth is, Mr. Ranger, I blew in all my wages at roulette last Edwards meekly answered, "I wasn't going to say anything out of the way. I was fixing for to praise her."

"All the same, I don't intend to discuss her with you," was Cavanagh's curt answer.

The hyder fell back into silence while the ranger prepared his lunch for the night. The fact that he transferred some of the blankets from his own bed to that of his visitor did not escape Edwards' keen eyes, and with grateful intent he said:

"I can give you a tip, Mr. Ranger," said he, breaking out of a silence. "The triangle outfit is holding more cattle on the forest than their permits call for."

"How do you know?"

"I heard one of the boys bragging about it."

"Much obliged," responded Ross. "I'll look into it."

Edwards went on: "Furthermore, they're fixing for another sheep kill over there too. All the sheepmen are armed. That's why I left the country. I don't want to run any more chances of being shot up. I've had enough of trouble. I can't afford to be hounded by judges and juries. I'm just a broken down old cowpuncher herding sheep in order to keep clear of the liquor belt."

This seemed reasonable, and the ranger remarked by way of dropping the subject: "I've nothing to say further than this—oh yes the rules of the forest and you won't get into any further trouble with me. And as for being shot up by the cowmen, you'll not be disturbed on any national forest. There never has been a single herder shot nor a sheep destroyed on this forest."

"I'm mighty glad to hear that," replied Edwards, with sincere relief. "I've had my share of shooting up and shooting down. All I ask now is quiet and the society of sheep. I take a kind of pleasure in protecting the fool brutes. It's about all I'm good for."

He did indeed look like a man in the final year of life as he spoke. "Better turn in," Cavanagh said in kindly tone. "I'm an early riser."

The old fellow rose stiffly and, laying aside his boots and trousers, rolled into his bunk and was asleep in three minutes.

Cavanagh himself was very tired and went to bed soon after to sleep dreamlessly till daylight. He sprang from his bed and after a plunge in the stream set about breakfast, while Edwards rose from his bunk grumbling and sighing and went forth to wrangle the horses, rubbing his hands and shivering as he met the keen edge of the mountain wind. When he returned breakfast was ready, and again he expressed his gratitude.

"Haven't you any slicker?" asked Cavanagh. "It looks like rain."

"No! I'm run down pretty low," he replied. "The truth is, Mr. Ranger, I blew in all my wages at roulette last

Will Jones

Ross brought out a canvas coat, well worn, but serviceable. "Take this along with you. It's likely to storm before we reach the sheep camp. And you don't look very strong. You must take care of yourself."

Edwards was visibly moved by this kindness. "Sure you can spare it?"

"Certain sure! I've another," returned the ranger curtly.

"It was hardly more than sunrise as they mounted their ponies and started on their trail, which led sharply upward after they left the canyon. The wind was strong and stinging cold."

Taking pity on Edwards, who was shivering, Cavanagh turned off the trail into a sheltered nook behind some pine trees.

"How do you happen to be reduced to herding sheep?" he asked. "You look like a man who has seen better days."

Edwards, chafing his thin fingers to warm them, made reluctant answer. "It's a long story, Mr. Ranger, and it concerns a whole lot of other people—some of them decent folks—so I'd rather not go into it."

"John Barleycorn was involved, I reckon."

"Sure thing. He's generally always in it."

"You'd better take my gloves. It's likely to snow in half an hour. Go ahead. I'm a younger man than you are."

The other made a decent show of resistance, but finally accepted the offer, saying: "You certainly are white to me. I want to apologize for making that attempt to sneak away that night. I had a powerful good reason for not staying any longer."

Ross smiled a little. "You showed bad judgment—as it turned out."

"I'm sure old that girl can shoot. Her gun was steady as a doorknob. She filled the door. Where did she learn to hold a gun like that?"

"Her father taught her, so she said."

"She wouldn't remember me—an old cuss like me—but I've seen her with Wetherford when she was a kidlet. I never thought she'd grow up into such a queen. She's a wonder. Lize looked sick to me. She ought to send her girl away or get out. As you say, the Fork is no kind of a place for such a girl."

He spoke with a good deal of feeling, and the ranger smiled him with deepening interest. He had taken on dignity in the heat of his protest, and in his eyes blazed something that was both manly and admirable.

"You're just the kind of a figure to catch a girl's eye. She likes you. I could see that, but you've got a good opinion of yourself. You're an educated man. Do you intend to marry her?"

"See here, Mr. Sheep Herder, you better ride on up to your camp." And Ross turned to mount his horse.

"Wait a minute," called the other man, and his voice surprised the ranger with a note of authority. "I was terribly taken with that girl, and I owe you a whole lot, but I've got to know one thing. I can see you're full of her and jealous as a bear of any other suitor. Now, I want to know whether you intend to marry her or whether you're just playing with her."

Ross was angry now. "What I intend to do is none of your business."

The other man was suddenly ablaze with passion. His form had lost its stoop. His voice was firm. "I merely want to say that if you feel that girl will kill you."

Ross stared at him, quite convinced that he had gone entirely mad. "That's mighty childish of you, Mr. Sheep Herder," he replied curtly. "But I'm at a loss to understand this sudden indignation on your part."

Cavanagh fairly roared before this retort. "His head runs as if he had been struck with a club. He perceives the truth of the man's words instantly. He gasped. "Good God, man, are you Ed Wetherford?"

The answer was quick. "That's who I am!" Then his voice changed. "But I don't want the women to know I'm alive. I didn't intend to let anybody know it. All the same, I mean it. If you or any man tries to abuse her I'll kill him! I've loaded her up with trouble, as you say, but I'm going to do what I can to protect her now that I'm in the county again."

Ross, confused by this new complication in the life of the girl he was beginning to love, stared at his companion in dismay. Was it not enough that Virginia's mother should be a shatterer and a temptress? At last he spoke. "Where have you been all these years?"

"In the Texas 'pen. I served nine years there."

"What for?"

"Shooting a man. It was a case of self defense, but his family had more money and influence than I did, so I went down the road. As soon as I got out I started north—just the way dog will point toward home. I didn't intend to come here, but some way, I couldn't keep away. I shied around the outskirts of the Fork, picking up odd jobs of sheep herding just to have time to turn things over. I know what you're thinking about—you're saying to yourself, 'Well, here's a nice father-in-law.' Well, now, I don't know anything about your people, but the Wetherfords are as good as anybody. If I hadn't come out into this cursed country, where even women go shooting wild, I would have been in congress, but, being hot headed, I must mix in. I'm not excusing myself, you understand. I'm not a desirable addition to any man's collection of friends, but I can promise you this—no one but yourself shall ever know who I am. At the same time, you can't deceive my girl without my being named in the funeral that will follow."

"You are only a distant and romantic figure to Lize—a part of the dead past," said Cavanagh. "She remembers you as a bold rider and a wondrously brave and chivalrous father."

"She must never know. You must promise never to tell her."

"I promise that," Cavanagh said, and Edwards went on:

"If I could bring something to her—prove to her I'm still a man—it might do to tell her, but I'm a branded man now and an old man, and there's no hope for me. I worked in one of the machine shops down there, and it took the life out of me. Then, too, I left a bad name here in the Fork. I know that. Those big cattlemen fooled me into taking their side of the war. I stalked everything I had on them, and then they railroaded me out of the county. So, you see, I'm double crossed, no matter where I turn."

Every word he uttered made more apparent to Cavanagh that Lee Virginia would derive nothing but pain and dishonourment from a knowledge that her father lived. "She must be spared this added burden of shameful inheritance," he decided.

The other man seemed to understand something of the ranger's indignant pity, for he repeated: "I want you to swear not to let Lee know I'm alive, no matter what comes. She must not be saddled with any record. Let her go on thinking what we are, give me your word." He held out an impatient palm.

Ross yielded his hand, and in spite of himself his tenderness for the broken man deepened. The sky was darkening in the west, and, with a glance upward, he said, "I reckon we'd better make your camp soon or you'll be chilled to the bone."

They mounted hastily and rode away, each feeling that his relationship to the other had completely changed. Wetherford marveled over the evident culture and refinement of the ranger. "He's none too good for her, no matter who he is," he said.

CHAPTER VII—PLACED AND REVERED.

UPON leaving timberline, Cavanagh and Wetherford entered upon a wide and sterile slope high on the rocky breast of the great peak whose splintered crest loomed above them. The air was all about, and a few feet higher up the canyons were filled with ice. It was a savage and homeless world, and in which to let a tent, but there among the rocks, where the minute canvas home of the shepherd, and close beside it, guarded by a lone dog and by a line like a thick spread sheet of raiment, the greatest of all the world's most timid creatures—the sheep—were huddled together.

"There's your house," shouted Ross to Wetherford.

The other man, with white face of dismay, looked about him, unable to make reply.

"Hello, there!" shouted Ross, wondering at the absence of human life about the camp. "Hello, the house!"

Receiving no answer to his hail, he turned to Wetherford. "Looks as if Ambro has pulled out and left the colts to tend the flock. He's been kind of seedy for some days."

Dismounting, he approached the tent. The colts, who knew him, seemed to understand his errand, for he leaped upon him as if to kiss his cheek. Ross put him down gently. "You're almost too glad to see me, old fellow. I wonder how long you've been here alone!"

Thereupon he opened the tent flap, but started back with instant perception of something wrong, for there, on his pile of ragged quilts, lay the Basque herder, with dusky face and rolling eyes, crazed with fever and entirely helpless. "You'd better not come in here, Wetherford," Ross warned. "Joe is here, horribly sick, and I'm afraid it's something contagious. It may be smallpox."

Wetherford recalled a step. "Smallpox! What makes you think that?"

"Well, these Basques have been having it over in their settlement, and besides, it smells like it." He listened a moment. "I'm afraid Joe's in for it. He's crazy with it. But he's a human being, and we can't let him die here alone. You must make some word for the stove, and I'll see what I can do for him."

Wetherford was old and wasted and thin, blooded, but he had never been a coward, and in his heart there still burned a small flame of his youthful, reckless, generous daring. Pushing Cavanagh one side, he said with firm decision: "You keep out of there. I'm the one to play nurse. This is my job."

"Nonsense! I am younger and stronger than you."

"Got away!" shouted the older man. "Grege! bless me to do this work, and (Continued on page seven)

The small vote cast at the primaries last week can be attributed to a number of causes. While some say it indicates indifference on the part of the electors we believe that it is not the reason, rather we believe that it shows that the people are satisfied with the men who are presiding over the courts of Michigan, and believe that it is not public policy to change; that they believe that they further the judiciary is removal from political strife the better off is, and the two term policy, which has almost become an unwritten law should be eliminated from the choice of our judicial and educational officers. Instead of being used as an argument against the primary system it is rather an argument in its favor, as it proves that a public official, who has served the people well, has nothing to fear when he leaves his case in their hands, but as was demonstrated last fall in the senatorial vote, if the people are dissatisfied they will turn out to the polls and register their disapproval.

The re-nomination of Judge Mayne, in this circuit, cannot but be a source of gratification to the judge. His opponent, Mr. Clink, made a spirited campaign, and demonstrated his popularity and high standing where he is best known by the splendid endorsement given him in his own home. The people of this circuit by their votes, have spoken and we congratulate the judge on their verdict and urge all to go to the polls in April.

was ever constructed without first laying the foundations and making this treaty we are placing the first stones in the foundations of the structure of national friendship with our neighbors on the north.

The importance may be seen in the fact that we have in our boundaries the longest danger lines in the world. No other nation is so exposed to such a menace. If we so build now as to secure this friendship on the north, we have a great north of kindly neighbors to help us to protect ourselves and to stand as one of the linkworks of national life, peace and safety. If we do not create this friendship we will in time come have to fortify that extensive boundary and station troops all along it, just as Germany, Russia and other European countries have now to do with their boundary lines. The cost of this is so much greater than we could possibly sacrifice in the treaty that it ought to be given the first consideration.

The convention urged the Michigan delegation in congress to support the permanent tariff legislation bill and also urged the direct election of United States senators. The question of temperance, initiative, referendum and recall were not touched upon, although the convention endorsed President Taft and Governor Osborn.

MAKE MICHIGAN DRY

State Wide Prohibition Bill is Introduced in the House

Women's Christian Temperance Union Hail the Bill—Very Strong Measure.

Contrary to the quite general opinion among members of the present legislature an effort will be made to put through a bill submitting to the people of the state the question of state wide prohibition. It is understood the W. C. T. U. of Michigan is chiefly interested in the latest campaign for prohibition throughout Michigan, though the party prohibitionists will lead their effort to the work of gaining a submission of the amendment.

It may authoritatively be stated that the anti-saloon league is not behind the move. The men working the interests of the league do not believe the time is yet ripe for an attempt to make the whole state dry. They are anxious to continue the work of broadening the dry territory until they are certain of votes enough to offset the big majorities that will be polled against state-wide prohibition in municipal centers.

The matter of a prohibition bill was brought to the attention of several members of the house last week. There was nothing definite at first, because the women who put forth the scheme were advised that the members consulted believed the time was not yet ripe.

This led to the conviction on the part of the women of the W. C. T. U. that no member of the house had the courage to introduce such a measure and when this reached the ears of several of the leading temperance members they immediately served notice that while the time did not seem ideal for the passage of such a bill, they did not desire to have it mused about that the members dared not introduce such a measure.

Three or four said they stood ready to put in the bill and fight it, even though they knew it would be a losing battle.

Last week the first state-wide prohibition bill was brought to Lansing by a committee of the W. C. T. U. and copies were distributed among the temperance members of the house and senate. It undoubtedly is a strong measure and the most practical, it is said, ever proposed by the prohibitionists of Michigan.

It has been introduced in the house by Representative Straight. "Now you are changing your insurance see me before placing your risks," Myrtle Young.

THEATRICAL

Everything is now in readiness for the big Damon and Pythias production which takes place Friday evening.

The cast is perfect in the lines and the way they go after the dramatic action is good to see. Enthusiasm has been in evidence, and of the real sort, from the beginning. Every member of the company seems bent on making this play outclass every effort that the city has ever known and such determination can only mean success.

The play is without a doubt the grandest production that a Charlevoix audience has been permitted to see and the public can rest assured that when they go to see Damon and Pythias they will get their money's worth in every respect and from the looks of things it seems that everyone is going to be there for the report of the boys who are hustling with the tickets is most flattering.

March 22 is the date which you want to remember and make no engagements for "What Happened to Smith" the senior play, which always is looked forward to as an annual event, claims that date and you don't want to miss it.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND

Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

It didn't matter whether I live or die. But you've got something to do in the world. My girl needs you, and she don't need me, so get out of here and stay out. Go home, see that wood and I'll go in and see what's the matter."

Cavanagh looked him in the face an instant. "Very well," said he, "I'll do as you say. There's no use of our both taking chances."

It was, certainly, to him, and the tent was dark and desolate, but as the fire in the little stove continued in snarl and the smoke to pour out of the pipe the small domestic took on cheer. Wetherford knew how to care for the sick, and in the shelter of the canvas wall developed unfettered vigor and decision. It was amazing to Cavanagh to witness his change of manner.

Soon a pan of water was steaming, and some hot stones were at the sufferer's feet, and when Wetherford appeared at the door of the tent his face was almost happy. "Well, a sheep. There isn't a thing but a feel of heat and a little drink in the place."

Twenty miles of most difficult trail lay between Cavanagh's cabin and this spot. To carry the sick man on his horse would not only be painful to the sufferer, but dangerous to the rescuer, for if the Basque were really ill of smallpox, contagion would surely follow. On the other hand, to leave him to die there unaided seemed inhuman, impossible.

"There is only one thing to do," he called to Wetherford, "and that is for me to ride back to the station and bring up some extra bedding and my own tent and so camp down beside you."

"All right, but remember I've established a quarantine. I'll crack your head if you break over the line on each."

There was no longer any feeling of renching up or reaching down between the two men—they were equals. Wetherford, altogether admirable, seemed to have regained his manhood as he stood in the door of the tent confronting the ranger. "This Basque ain't much of a find, but, as you say, he's human, and we can't let him lie here and die. I'll stay with him till you can find a doctor or till he dies."

"I take off my hat to you," responded Cavanagh. "You see a man."

Once back at his cabin after leaving Wetherford, Cavanagh set himself to cooking some food to take back with him to the peak. He brought in his pack horse and burdened him with camp outfit and utensils and extra clothing. He filled his pockets with such necessities as he possessed, and so at last, just as night was falling, he started back over his difficult trail.

Wetherford met him at the door, no longer the poor old tramp, but a priest, one who had devoted himself to Christ's service.

"How is he?" asked the ranger. "Delicious," replied the herder. "I've had to hold him to his bed. I'm glad you've come. It's lonesome up here. Don't come too near. Set your tent down there by the trees. I can't have you infected. Keep clear of me and this camp."

"I've got some food and some extra clothing for you."

"Put 'em down here, and in the morning drive these sheep away. That noise disturbs the dog, and I don't like it myself; they sound lonesome and helpless. That dog took 'em away for awhile, but brought 'em back again. Poor devil, he don't know what to think of it all."

Ross did as Wetherford commanded him to do and withdrew a little way down the slope and without putting up his tent rolled himself in his blankets and went to sleep.

The ranger's first duty in the morning was to feed the faithful colts and to send him forth with the flock. His next was to build a fire and cook some breakfast for Wetherford, and as he put it down beside the tent door he heard the wild pleading of the Basque, who was struggling with his nurse, doubtless in the belief that he was being kept a prisoner. Only a few words like "go home" and "sheep" were intelligible to either the nurse or the ranger.

Cavanagh waited till a silence came; then called softly, "Here's your breakfast, Wetherford."

"Move away," retorted the man within. "Keep your distance."

wasting your breath. I don't intend to let you come any nearer than you are. There is work for you to do. Besides, there's my girl. You're detailed to look after her."

"Would a doctor come?" asked Ross quite huskily, moved by Wetherford's words. "It's a hard climb. Would they think the dogs worth it?"

Wetherford's face darkened with a look of doubt. "It is a hard trip for a city man, but maybe he would come for you for the government."

"I doubt it, even if I were to offer my next month's salary as a fee. These hills are very remote to the townsfolk and one day more or less of no importance, but I'll see what I can do."

Ross was really more concerned for Wetherford himself than for the Basque. "If the fever is something malignant we must have medical aid," he said and went slowly back to his own camp to ponder his puzzling problem.

One thing could certainly be done, and that was to inform Gregg and Murphy of their herder's illness. Surely they would come to the rescue of the colts and his flock. The speech of the telephone involved either a ride over into Deer Creek or a journey to the Park. He was tempted to ride all the way to the Park, for to do so would permit another meeting with Lee. But to do this would require many days' longer, and half a day's delay might prove fatal to the Basque, and, besides, each hour of loneliness and rendered Wetherford just so much more open to the deadly attack of the disease.

It was hard to leave an old and broken man in such a drear and wild country, but to leave a head to be done so, becoming his tent, seemingly behind a clump of bushes, Cavanagh mounted his horse and rode away across the boundary of the forest into Deer Creek basin, which had been the home of wolf contention for nearly four years. It had once been a part of the forest, but under pressure the president had permitted it to be restored to the public lands open for entry. It was not "agricultural grounds," as certain ranchers claimed, but it was excellent summer pasture, and the sheepmen and cattlemen had leaped at once into warfare to possess it. Sheep were beaten to death with clubs by hundreds; herders were hustled out of the park with ropes about their necks and their outfits destroyed, and all this within a few miles of the forest boundary, where one small sentinel kept effective watch and ward.

Cavanagh had never been over this trail but once, and he was trying to locate the cliff from which a flock of sheep had been hurled by cattlemen some years before when he perceived a thin column of smoke rising from a rocky hillside. With habitual watchfulness as to fire, he raised his glass to his eyes and studied the spot. It was evidently a campfire and smoldering dangerously, and, turning his head, he rode toward it to stamp it out. It was not upon his patrol, but that did not matter. His duty was clear.

As he drew near he began to perceive signs of a broken camp. The ground was littered with utensils. It was not an ordinary campfire, and the ranger's heart quickened. "Another sheep herder, has been driven out and his tent and provisions burned," he exclaimed wrathfully.

His horse snorted and shied as he rode nearer, and then a shudder passed through the ranger's heart as he perceived in the edge of the smoldering embers a boot heel and then a charred hand! In the smoke of that fire was the reek of human flesh.

For a long time the ranger sat on his horse, peering down into those ashes until at last it became evident to his eyes that at least two sheep herders had been sacrificed on the cattlemen's altar of hate and greed.

All about on the sod the story was written, all too plain. Two men, possibly three, had been murdered, cut to pieces and burned not many hours before. There stood the bloody spade with which the bodies had been dismembered, and there lay an empty can whose lid had been poured upon the smoldering camp utensils, tent and wagon of the herders in the attempt to incinerate the bodies and dismembered limbs of the victims. The lawlessness of the range had culminated. The ferocity of the herder had gone beyond the savage. Here in the sweet autumn air the reek of the cattlemen's vengeance rose like some hideous vapor, poisonous and obscene.

The ranger sickened as the bloody tale unfolded itself before him. Then a fierce hate of such warfare flamed in his heart. Could this enormity be committed under any other civilized flag? Would any other government tolerate so foully so childishly its sheep and protect authority as to permit such atrocities?

In his horror, his sense of revolt, he cursed the state of which he was a citizen. He would have resigned his commission at the moment, so intense was his resentment of the apathy, carelessness, fatal slattern government under which he was serving.

"By the Lord," he breathed, with solemn intensity, "if this does not shame the people of this state into revolt, if these deeds are not hounded and hanged, I will myself carry them. I cannot live and do my duty here unless this crime is avenged by law."

Chilled, shivering and numb, he set spurs to his horse and rode furiously down the trail toward the nearest town, so eager to spread the alarm that he could scarcely breathe a deep breath. On the steep slopes he was forced to walk, and his horse led so fairly that his agony of impotence was deepened. He had a vision of the murderers riding fast into fair counties. Each hour made their apprehension progressively the more difficult.

"Who were they?" he asked himself again and again. "What kind of man did this thing? Was the leader a man like Hallard? Even so, he was hired by whom? By ranchers covetous of the range that was absolutely certain."

It was long after noon when he came to the end of the trail. There in a little store and post office the upper falls of Deer Creek. The telephone had a tooth fortunately, and he soon had Hallard's ear. But his voice was so strained and unnatural that his chief did not recognize it.

"Is that you, Ross? What's the matter? Your voice sounds hoarse."

Less concerned himself and told his story briefly. "Now listen. The limit of this cattlemen's ferocity has been reached. As I rode down here to get into communication with a doctor for a sick herder I came upon the scene of another murder and burning. The fire is still smoldering. At least two bodies are in the embers."

At last, bit by bit, from hurried speech, the supervisor derived the fact, the location, the hour, and directed the herder to ride back and guard the remains till the sheriff arrived.

"Keep it all quiet," warned Ross, "and get the sheriff and a doctor to come up here as quick as you can. What's this country coming to?" he cried in despair. "Will this deed go unavenged like the rest?"

Hallard's voice had lost its optimism of the ring. "I don't know, I am stunned by it all. Don't do anything rash, Ross. Wait till I come. Perhaps this is the turning point on here. I'll be up at the earliest moment."

The hubbubbed and disheartened ranger then called up Lee Virchula, and the sound of her sweet voice turned his thoughts to other and in a sense more important matters, for when she heard his name she cried out with such eager longing and appeal that his heart leaped. "Oh, I wish you were here! Mother has been worse today. She is asking for you. Can't you come down and see her? She wants to tell you something."

"I can't, I can't," he stammered. "I'm a long way off, and I have important work to do. Tell her I will come tomorrow. Dear girl, there is a sick man, far up on the mountain side with no one to care for him but a poor old herder who is in danger of falling sick himself. I must go back to them; but, believe me, I will come just as soon as my duties will let me. You understand me, don't you?"

Her voice was fainter as she said. "Yes, but I—it seems hard to wait."

"I know. Your voice has helped me. I was in a black mood when I came here. I'm going back now to do my work, and then I will come to you. Goodbye."

Strangely beautiful and very subtle was the vibrant stir of that wire as it conveyed back to his ear the little sigh with which she made answer to his plea. He took his way upward in a mood which was meditative, but no longer bitter.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

WELL, WELL, WHAT A SELL! I went to take a photograph. Or a big, noisy goose. Her owner took me to the coop. And turned the old bird loose.

That woman and her goose looked round. And talked at such a pitch I hardly knew which one to snap. I couldn't tell which was which.

At last I snapped them both in one. I thought that plan was best. I'd later study out the thing. When my mind was at rest.

Well, when I got that photo made I felt about half shot. The one I thought a goose to be. My golly, it was not!

It was a gander with long neck. The other was not there. She'd talked herself clear off the place. And disappeared in air.

WILLARD MEMORIAL

Meeting at Congregational Church was Well Attended.

The Willard Memorial meeting held in the Congregational church last Sunday evening under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. was, to say the least, a very interesting one, the churchmen uniting in the service. The church was well filled, chairs being placed in the aisles. Every number on the program was well carried out, each one doing their best. The general officers marched to the platform each wearing the bow of white with long ends fastened to the left shoulder each taking hold of one end of the ribbon next them, thus forming a festoon, adding to the impressiveness of the occasion. After singing by the congregation the general officers repeated portions of scripture followed by prayer by Rev. H. A. Putnam. Five girls dressed in white each gave a word picture of Frances E. Willard, when a girl in her father's home in Wisconsin. The normal class sang "The Crusade Glory Song." Mrs. Putnam had prepared an excellent paper but was unable to be present to read it herself and Miss Whiting kindly consented to read it. Instrumental music by the Saunders children was much appreciated, they always play nicely and this was no exception. The male quartet gave fine selections.

The school globe was placed on the platform on which was fastened eight streamers of the white ribbon eight little girls winding the white ribbon round the world, singing as they did so, this exercise was a most beautiful one.

Rev. Dewey Eble gave a most excellent address, touching on a few of the many experiences in the life of Mrs. Willard and how she came to take up the work she did, giving twenty-five years of her noble life to temperance work, "she being dead yet speaketh." The song "Victory" sung by Mrs. Marting was the cap sheet of the evening. It certainly was beautifully rendered. Rev. H. A. Putnam pronounced the benediction, thus closing the evening program.

The total cost of maintaining the jails, traveling and other expenses during the year was $302,237.22, of which sum $145,818.03 was paid to sheriffs for board and keeping of prisoners.

The latter sum includes the amount received for locks and padlocks. The average cost per week for board and keeping of prisoner was 67 cents. These figures are compiled from the reports of the various sheriffs of the state for the last year.

Poultry Pointers.

Foreleg the molt by starving the hen is not considered a good practice. Clean the coops thoroughly before you put them away. Get them under cover, too, if you can. They will last so much longer.

Two parts lard and one part turpentine will often cure "bumblefoot" in the afflicted bird. If discovered in time and the remedy given promptly.

Ducks intended for breeding should be separated from those intended for market. It will be an advantage if they can have plenty of range and swimming water.

Cut hay into about one inch lengths and pour enough hot water on it nearly to cover. Allow it to stand overnight and feed in the morning. Feed about three times a week during winter.

Warm wheat for breakfast makes the fiddles shell out the eggs.

Fresh air is all right for the hens, but not when it is sifted through knot-holes and cracks between the boards.

Meat meal and beef—any—are rich in protein and mineral matter and especially desirable for molting hens and pullets kept for layers. Where insects are not abundant meat in some form should supply a portion of the ration of laying hens.

If the roosts in the henhouses are high the heavier birds are almost sure to suffer from bruised feet, commonly known as bumblefoot. This is caused by jumping from the roost to the hard floor.

There are no magically ash heaps on the farm of the man who knows their fertilizing value.

Candidates for Public Office Will be Held Down

If Bill Introduced by Senator James is Enacted Into Law.

A bill revolutionizing the present system of conducting political campaigns has been introduced by Senator James.

Not only does the measure make it unlawful for candidates to seek votes by giving away drinks, tobacco or other gifts, but it also prohibits persons from soliciting favors from them by promising their support. Candidates cannot promise to provide supporters with an appointment to a public or private office.

Expenses are limited to 15 per cent of one year's salary, providing that the 15 per cent is not less than $100. Under provisions of the bill no corporations or persons owning the majority of the stock of a corporation having right to condemn land or exercise public franchise can contribute to aid or prevent the nomination or election of any candidate.

Any priest, minister or officer of any church or religious or other organization who shall privately attempt to swing votes is made guilty of corrupt practice by the bill.

Provisions prohibiting betting on election results or the publication by newspapers or periodicals of advertisements unless it is stated that they are paid also are in the bill. It is made unlawful to circulate through the mails or otherwise any printed matter relating to any election unless it bears on its face the name and address of the author, printer and publisher.

It is also made unlawful for any person to solicit from candidates the purchase of tickets for balls, entertainments or advertisements, or to persuade him to join any organization of which he is not a member at the time of announcing his candidacy.

The Impossible.

The Duke of Wellington wanted a certain piece of work done and instructed an officer of the Royal Engineers to do it. After examination the officer informed the duke that it was impossible.

The duke sent for another officer, a much younger man and attached to another division of the army. This officer did what the duke required.

The next morning there appeared in the "orders of the day" the following epigrammatic note: "He who in war fails to do what he undertakes may always plead accident, which invariably attends military affairs, but he who declares a thing to be impossible which is subsequently accomplished registers his own incapacity."

In the Handling and Care of Cream for Butter Making.

POOR BUTTER IS NOT MARKETABLE

Buyers Demand Nothing But the Highest Grade.

Farmers Urged to Keep the Cream in Prime Condition Until Placed in Hands of Butter Makers.

We have received the following interesting letter from Henry Block which will well repay careful reading by our dairymen:

We have just finished another year—I think the most successful in the history of the dairy business in Charlevoix county. We have had a substantial increase in our output. We have on the average realized a good price for our product, which has tended to create for our patrons, prosperity, unequaled in any previous year.

We have met with obstacles, to be sure, but those have been overcome by a determination to win.
We have not at all times had "easy sliding," problems not easily solved have at times confronted us. Considerable thinking and planning have been found necessary in order to make "the ball roll," but we have been fortunate in avoiding catastrophes of any disastrous nature.
We are now entering upon a new year; the future only can decide its fate, and let me say we are also entering upon an era of different conditions. Prices on creamery butter have ranged high, in fact too high, especially for the year preceding November 1910. The country has been scourged by buyers of creamery butter, who were anxious to get it and pay top prices for it. The commission houses of the large cities in the east have kept agents constantly in the field, who have called on the various creameries, soliciting consignments of butter for their respective houses. In fact dealers in butter have been scrambling to procure as large quantities as possible for cold storage. But the tide has turned. Early last summer the managers of creameries suspected there was something wrong. This fact became more and more evident as time went on. We felt that something was out of joint, but could not say exactly what. We set at work to ascertain what might be the cause of the situation, and found that there were several reasons that undoubtedly worked hand in hand to bring about serious conditions. We will give below a few of the reasons:

Early in June last the butter market began to show tendencies to a dull, dragging tone. The market had lost its crispness. There was an over supply of the lower grades.
After a while accumulation of low grades began to pile up, and liberal concessions in prices had to be made in order to move it all. Fancy butter continued to be scarce and was readily taken at a premium over market price. The scarcity of fancy butter and the over abundant of the lower grades naturally caused a great gap between the prices of the two, which kept on increasing from time to time until the difference in price between top and third grades was eight cents a pound.

There was a time when we used to think that creamery butter was creamery butter, but that time is past. We must now manufacture a No. 1 article in order to secure a top price. How is this to be brought about? We will try and discuss this latter.

Co-operation is at the present time one of the most popular subject for discussion, and it is an interesting one indeed. What does it mean? It means simply and purely to help one another. It is indeed the divine doctrine as taught by the great master. Co-operation in its true sense is one of the grandest things on earth, but co-operation is not always co-operation—Three boys went together one night to steal apples in an orchard. One of the lads was to pick the fruit from the tree, the other was to put it in the sack, while the third one was to keep watch at the gate to give an alarm, should there be any sign of danger. This was co-operation.

But lo, at the first sign of danger the watchman took to flight, leaving the other two to suffer the consequences of their deed. This was abuse of co-operation. Brown, Smith and Jones each own a good sized farm. They lived side by side in harmony and peace. They sowed their wheat, they reaped it and thresh it, they hauled it to market. Brown gets No. 1 hard, Smith No. 1 northern and Jones gets No. 3 and 4 dockage, and he had to sell some rejected, because some of his stacks had taken water and the wheat had moulded. The next year out three farmers conceived the idea of cooperation. They would save the profits which went to the milling company by manufacturing their wheat into flour and thus place their product on the market in a finished form. They erected a mill installed modern machinery, hired a first class miller and were ready for business. This was co-operation.
When the grain was threshed the next season, Brown, Smith and Jones began hauling to the mill.
While the first two brought nice clean and well seasoned wheat, Jones' wheat had the same fault as the previous year. This did not exactly meet with the approval of Brown and Smith, but it was finally decided it would not make very much difference if it was thoroughly mixed with the good wheat. The proper mixing was done and it was all turned into flour, which indeed had all the appearance of excellence. The flour was promptly shipped to market. It was inspected by the proper officers and pronounced fine in style and color, but very inferior in flavor on account of musty wheat. It was sold for what it was worth and netted the owners 75 cents per barrel less than the price of No. 1 flour or less than it would have brought had not the moulded wheat been mixed in. This was abuse of cooperation. If I should ask you what you think of such a deal you would declare it ridiculous, and in-just in the extreme to those who furnish the good wheat. These are exactly the conditions prevailing in the average creamery of today.
Some of the farmers deliver good, wholesome cream and milk, while others bring cream that is not fit to make butter from. It is only fit for the dumping ground and it would pay better to put it there than to mix it with good cream and spoil even that, even if we had to pay full price for it.

As above stated there is now eight cents difference in the price of low and No. 1 grades. Can you afford to let this state of conditions further prevail? This is for you to determine. We will try and state some of the reasons for the present depression in the butter market. It is an evident fact that the buying or purchasing capacity of the laboring class has been materially reduced during the last ten months.
The working man can no longer afford so many luxuries as he did during the flush times of a year or two ago. Butter a year ago was too expensive for many.

FISH TUG HOPE SUNK

Was Returning from Trip When Accident Happened

Captain Charles Anderson and Two Other Members Were Lost.

Monday a telegram was received by Olin Nordrum from Gloucester, Mass., stating that the gasoline fish tug Hope, formerly of this port and owned by Captain Charles Anderson, had been run down in the outer harbor at that place and all on board lost.

Later reports state that the tug was run down in the outer harbor on her return from laying nets, and her captain, Charles Anderson, Patrick Anderson and George Wiggins, were lost. From what we can learn the tug had been out and laid a gang of nets and had also lifted another and were on their return to port when the accident happened.

It will be remembered that the Hope left here last August with a number of other fish tugs. Captain Anderson was well known in this city. He leaves a wife, but no children. The other two men were unmarried.

BIG APPLE SHOW

One Being Planned to be Held in Grand Rapids

Early in November—Expert Demonstrations in Sorting and Packing.

Michigan is to have a great apple show next fall—the first ever held in the state and one of the best in the entire country. It will be held in Grand Rapids in the early part of November, and exhibits will be invited from all western Michigan.
The chief object of the show will be to demonstrate that Michigan is already a leading apple-raising state, that it produces fruit of finest quality, and that it possesses big opportunities for development along the orchard lines. It will aim to stimulate the interest of the people in general in Michigan apples, to encourage growers to higher skill in the culture and marketing of apples and to awaken new growers to the possibilities on the broad expanse of orchard lands now awaiting development in this part of the state.

Western Michigan has shown its apples at Chicago and at other places, and it has carried off many prizes and many honors. These shows have done a great amount of good in their way, but it is a recognized fact that a fruit show realizes more value right in the center of the industry it represents than it does when held at some outside point. Hence the holding of Michigan's first apple show in Grand Rapids.

This show will be worth much to growers, buyers, consumers and the state. In fact the place will enable growers to compare the products of their orchards and their methods with the products of other orchards and other methods. It will be a real school for them.

It will be of great value to buyers. They will be able to see what Michigan produces now, and what it is capable of producing. They will be able to study different varieties of apples and to reach conclusions as to market values. They will be able to confer with growers as to growing and marketing methods. The exchange in knowledge and experience will be worth much to both.

And as to consumers, well, it will be a revelation to them. They will understand what great things
Michigan is capable of in an apple growing way. Their interest will be awakened in this new and growing industry and the industry will benefit by the awakening.

As to Michigan itself this exhibition of its apple producing powers will be worth much in values. The show is bound to stimulate apple raising and the stimulation of apple raising means the enrichment of old farms and the establishment of new farms.

A part of the show will be expert demonstrations in packing, sorting and judging apples. This will be a school of interest to all persons.
The work will be done by men who are acknowledged as authorities in their line.

GAME WARDENS MEET

Present Fish Laws Satisfactory—Other Matters Discussed.

At the call of C. S. Pierce, of Lansing, the state game warden, the following gentlemen met at Charlevoix last week at the Commercial Fisherman's Convention, to talk with the fishermen and endeavor to ascertain if the laws were satisfactory to them.

W. J. Pierson, representative and chairman of the Fish and Fisheries committee. J. B. Eddy, D. W., of Saint Ste. Marie; Chas. Smith, chief deputy warden, Petoskey; Ben Elmus, deputy warden of Ludington;
G. A. Smith, D. W., of Traverse City;
Chas. Hoyt, D. W., of Grand Haven and Deputy Warden Stanford of Boyne City were present.

The fishermen reported that they were thoroughly satisfied with the fish laws as they stand at present.

State Warden Pierce also instructed each of the deputy wardens to be continually on the lookout for forest fires.

BOYNE CITY WON GAME

First Game of Season Played Between Two Girl Teams

Poor Team Work Result of Poor Showing by Charlevoix Girls.

Last Saturday night the Charlevoix high school basket ball girls had the pleasure of the invasion of the fast Boyne City high school girls' basket ball team on their own floor, which resulted in an emphatic defeat for the locals by a score of 28 to 9. Boyne City has to be given considerable credit for their work.
This was the first game played with an outside team and they did not seem at all frightened in that respect. Boyne City has two promising young ladies in their team who will in short time develop into classy players. Misses Boisen and Longwell are fast players who show accuracy, and with some more playing they will come to a high standard on the team. These girls are only freshmen and have three years to get to the front.

Charlevoix has good material and they may get to the front by close observation of the plays. Charlevoix did fair fielding, but lacked the vim in guarding the opposing girls. Many held baskets were fielded by Boyne and Charlevoix left them unguarded in their plays, thus allowing practically free throws which greatly crippled them in the first half. In the second half there were some lively team work and Charlevoix held Boyne down to a level of 4 points.
Following is the lineup and game
by plays:

Charlevoix: Kirkpatrick, R. F., Boisen,
Ward, L. F., Longwell, Madill, J. C., Gates,
Markham, R. C., Petrie,
Nowland, R. G., Tooley,
Kralick, L. G., Selkirk,
McNeil, Sub., Capelin.

Play from center and Madill plays to Charlevoix territory, Ward scores 2 points. Ball to center to Charlevoix territory and Charlevoix fouls.
Longwell scores free throw of one point. Ball from center to Boyne territory and Boisen fields two point basket. Ball to center to Boyne territory and Charlevoix fouls with Longwell falling on throw. She recovers ball and scores field play. Ball to center to Boyne territory and Longwell scores two points. In center play Boyne fouls Kirkpatrick falls on free throw and Boisen fouls on Charlevoix line.
Kirkpatrick again falls on free throw. Ball to Boyne territory and Boisen fouls, Kirkpatrick falls to throw and Boyne again fouls in her own territory, with Kirkpatrick falling in a free throw. Ball to center; Kirkpatrick lives up and holds guard; throws ball to Charlevoix territory, Boisen fouls, followed by Charlevoix, and Longwell scores one point. Ball to center to Boyne and Longwell scores 2 points, followed by Boisen in next play with same points. Center to Charlevoix and Boisen recovers, with Longwell scoring two points. Ball to center to Charlevoix and to Boyne and Boisen again scores 2 points, followed by Longwell for same count in next center play. Ball to center and Boisen scores two points. Ball to center to Charlevoix back to Boisen and Boisen scores 2 points again. Center to Charlevoix, Boisen fouls and Ward falls on free throw.
Time called. Score 22 to 2.

Ten minutes intermission was called between the halves, which played fifteen minutes. In the second half McNeil took Ward's place and Ward left Madill's place, Ma-dill going to the bench. Capelin takes Selkirk's place.

SECOND HALF
Ball play at center, Ward plays to Charlevoix territory, Kirkpatrick scores 2 points. Ball to center to Charlevoix, back to Boyne Charlevoix fouls and Longwell falls to score. Ball to center to Charlevoix to Boyne and Longwell fields 2 points. Ball to center to Charlevoix to Boyne and Longwell scores 2 points. Ball to center to Charlevoix and Kirkpatrick scores
2 points. Ball to Boyne and fouls, Kirkpatrick scores one point. Ball to center to Boyne to Charlevoix, McNeil scores 2 points. Ball to Charlevoix territory. Time out.
Tooley takes Boisen's place and Selkirk takes guard, retiring Boisen.
Boisen then fouls and Kirkpatrick falls to score. Ball to center to Charlevoix with scrimmage play in Charlevoix territory. Charlevoix lives up and fouls, with Longwell falling on throw. Ball from center to Charlevoix and Boisen fouled Kirkpatrick falls. Ball to center to in Boyne territory and Boisen fouls.

Kirkpatrick again fails to score.
Ball to Boyne to center, Charlevoix fouls, Longwell to count. Ball to center to Charlevoix, Boisen fouls and Kirkpatrick fails at free throw, ball in Charlevoix territory and Charlevoix fouls, Longwell falls.
Time called and Boisen wins by a score of 28 to 9.

GOOD PAYING CROP

Two Hundred and Sixteen Dollars for a Sleigh Load of Clover Seed.

E. E. Milton of South Milton township, Antrim county, believes he has solved the problem of putting his farm products in the most condensed form before marketing. The other day he received a check for $216.00 for a single load of clover seed. The load consisting of 30 bushels, which after cleaning was reduced to 21 bushels, and the price received was $90.00 per bushel.
He found it much easier to bring the 30 bushels of clover seed to town than hauling a load of hay, and the returns considerably more satisfactory.

The raising of clover seed is becoming quite an industry in Antrim county. It has been found that the soil and climate prevailing in this section of western Michigan produces a seed which is stronger in vitality than is the average.
Hence, seedsmen are calling for northern grown seeds and at the present time the local growers are unable to anywhere near supply the demand. It is urged that clover will do extra well on the light soil that prevails in certain parts of western Michigan and it is believed that the time is near at hand when much of the light soil land can be made to pay enormous profits of the capital that is invested in it.

ANNUAL MEETING

Met at Home of Dr. and Mrs. A. M.
Wilkinson.

MEETING WAS LARGELY ATTENDED

Reports Were Made by the General Officers

Update on "Resolved that the Platform is More Powerful Than the Press" was Decided in Favor of Affirmative.

The annual meeting of the Charlevoix Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held Friday afternoon, March 10, at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Allan Wilkinson. The president, Mrs. S. J. Alcock, called the meeting to order, and introduced the district president, Mrs. P. J.
Howard of Petoskey, as the guest of honor. After responding to the warm welcome extended to her,
Mrs. Howard led the devotional service of the meeting. The minutes of the last regular meeting were then read and approved, after which the general officers gave their reports. The recording secretary, Mrs. B. P. Wilkinson; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Richard Lewis; treasurer, Mrs. John Burns; financial secretary, Miss Agnes Rodger; superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, Miss Jessie Hines, all spoke of the work of their department for the past year and their reports showed favorable progress.
The work of the teachers in the city schools in carrying out so fully and faithfully the provisions of the law requiring scientific instruction regarding the effects of alcohol and narcotics on the human system, was warmly commended.

An interesting feature of the meeting then followed. This consisted in admitting to honorary membership the twelve young women of the county normal class.
The ceremony was brief, but impressive. The president read the pledge and obligate on, and the new members were then invested with the bow of white ribbon, the venerable district president leading the union in the Chatauqua salute in honor of the new members.

The annual election of officers followed, the result of which will be announced later.

After the election a violin solo was given by Mr. E. Stiles, with piano accompaniment by Miss Anna Alcock. The closing number on the program was a debate by members of the normal class "Resolved, That the Platform is More Powerful Than the Press." The affirmative was presented by Hallie Bon and Lila Shapton, and the negative by Retta Carr and Hazel Price.
The decision of the judges was in favor of the affirmative.

The annual supper was then served and was largely patronized and heartily enjoyed.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger
 The Great Conservation Novel
 By HAMLIN GARLAND

CHAPTER VI—Continued.
 CHAPTER XV.
 SHADOWS ON THE MIST.

THE decision which Cavanagh made between love and duty distinguished the officer from the man, the soldier from the civilian. He did not hesitate to act, and yet he suffered a mental conflict as he rode back toward the scene of that human sacrifice on the altar of greed.

"It will be hours before any part of the sheriff's posse can reach the forest, even though they take to the swiftest horses, and then other long hours must intervene before I can ride down to her. Yes, at least a day and a night must drag their slow course before I can hope to be of service to her." And the thought drew a groan of anxiety from him. At such moments of mental stress the trail is a tortoise and the mountain side an insurmountable barrier.

Halfway to the hills he was intercepted by an old man who was at work on an irrigating ditch beside the road. He seemed very nervous and very suspicious, and as he questioned the ranger his eyes were like those of a dog that fears his master's hand. Ross wondered about this afterward, but at the moment his mind was busy with the significance of this patient, furtive figure in the most picturesque and sterile landscape of the stockman.

"Here, within twenty miles of this powerful fruit power," he said, "is the mountain side of the free-roaming country. He wondered as he rode on whether the papers of the state would make a best of this deed. "Will this be made the theme for caustic comment in the eastern press for a day and then be forgotten?"

As his hot blood cooled he lost faith in even this sacrifice. Could anything change the leopard west into the tame-ness and serenity of the ox? "No," he decided; "nothing but death will do that. This generation, these fierce and bloody hearts, must die. Only in that way can the tradition of violence be overcome and a new state reared."

At the foot of the tolling, upward winding trail he dismounted and led his weary horse. Over his head and about halfway to the first hilltop lay a roof of fleecy vapor, faint purple in color and seamless in texture. Through this he must pass, and it seemed to him the line of demarcation between the plain and the mountain, between order and violence.

Slowly he led his horse along the mountain side, grasping with eager desire at every changing aspect of the marvelous mountain scene. It was infinitely more gorgeous, more compelling, than his moonlight experience the night before.

As he led his horse out upon a projecting point of rocky ledge to rest his love for the range came back upon him with such power that tears welled his eyes and his throat choked. "Where else will I find such scenes?" this he asked himself. "Where... all the wonders could such splendors shine? How can I leave this high world in which these wonders come and go? I will not. Here will I bring my bride and build my home. This is my world."

But the mist grew gray, the aureole of fire faded, the sun went down behind the hills, and the call of evening deepened on the trail, and as he re-approached the scene of man's inhumanity to man the thought of coupling there beside those buried bones called for heroic resolution. He was hungry, too, and as the air plucked he shivered.

"At the best the sheriff cannot reach here before midnight," he said, and settled down to his unsought, revolting vigil.

His one relief lay in the mental composition of a long letter to Lee Virginia, whose life at that moment was a comfort to him. "If such purity, such sweetness, can come from violence and vulgarly then surely a new and splendid state can rise even out of the ashes of these murdered men. Perhaps this is the end of the old," he mused, "perhaps this is the beginning of the new," and as he pondered the last faint vision died out of the west.

"So must the hate and violence die out of America," he said, "leaving the clear, sweet air of liberty behind."

It was near to the pool at the moment, for he was also the lover. His allegiance to the great republic stilled the test. His faith in democracy was shaken, but not destroyed. "I will wait," he decided. "This shall be the sign. If this deed goes unavenged then will I put off my badge and my uniform and go back to the land where for a hundred years the dark, such deeds as these have been impossible."

He built a fire as night fell to serve both as a beacon and as a defense against the cold. He felt himself worldly remote in this vigil. From his far height he looked abroad upon the tumbled plain as if upon an ocean dimly perceptible, yet august. "At this moment," he said, "envious and perhaps gully eyes are wondering what my spark of firelight may mean."

His mind went again and again to that tall old man in the ditch. What was the meaning of his scared and sorrowful glance? Why should one so powerfully employed at such a time as this be haunted by the look of a hunted deer? What meant the tremor in his voice?

Was it possible that one so gentle as Cavanagh, very tired and very hungry, rode up to the sheep herder's tent. Wetherford was sitting in the sun calmly smoking his pipe, the sheep were feeding not far away, attended by the dog, and an air of peace covered his small rocky world.

"How is the breeze?" asked the ranger.

Wetherford pointed upward. "All over."

"Then it wasn't smallpox?"

"I reckon that's what it was; it sure was there. I judge it's a case of Injun burial—no ceremony—right here in the rocks. I'll let you dig the hole (I'm just about all in, but mind you keep to the windward all the time. I don't want you spotted).

Cavanagh understood the urgency for these precautions, but first of all came his need of food and rest. Turning his first horse to grass, he stretched himself along a grassy sunny cranny between the rocks and there ate and afterward slept, while all about him the lands called and the cones whined.

He was awakened by a pebble tossed upon him, and he woke astartled, stiff and sore, but feeling stronger and in better temper. The sun was wearing low. Setting to work at his task, he threw the loose rock out of a hollow in the ledge near by, and to this rule squatted Wetherford dragged the dead man, refilling all and, and there piled a cairn of rocks above his grave.

The ranger took a hand at the end and rolled some large boulders upon the grave to insure the wolves' defeat.

"Now, burn the bedding," he commanded. "The whole camp has got to go, and your clothing, too, after we get down the hill."

"What will we do with the sheep?"

"Drive them over the divide and leave them."

All these things Wetherford did, and, leaving the camp in ashes behind him, Cavanagh drove the sheep before him on his homeward way. As night fell the dog, at his command, rounded them up and put them to bed, and the men went on down the valley, leaving the brave brute on guard, pathetic figure of faithful guardianship.

It hurts me to desert you, old fellow," called the ranger, looking back, "but there's no help for it. I'll come up in the morning and bring you some biscuit."

It was long after dark when they entered the canyon just above the cabin, and Wetherford was shivering from cold and weakness.

"Now, you pull up just outside the gate and wait there till I bring out some blankets. Then you've got to strip to the skin and start the world all over again," said Cavanagh. "I'll build a life here, and we'll create your past. How about it?"

"I'm willing," responded Wetherford. "You can burn everything that belongs to me but my wife and my girl."

All through the ceremony which followed ran this self-fanter. "I'll be all ranger, bearing a commission," he said, "with a grin as he put on the olive yellow shirt and a pale of dusty green trousers. "And here goes my past," he added, as he tossed his contaminated rags upon the fire.

"What a corking opportunity to make a fresh start," commented Cavanagh. "I hope you see it."

"I see it, but it's hard to live up to your mark."

When every precaution had been taken the ranger led the freshly scrubbed, accented and transformed fugitive to his cabin.

"Why, man, you're fit for the state legislature," he exclaimed as they came into the tent. "My clothes don't precisely meet every demand you make upon them, but they give you an air of command. I wish your wife could see you now." Then, seeing that Wetherford was really in earnest, he added: "You can stay with me as long as you wish. Perhaps in time you might be able to work into the service as a guard, although the chief is getting more and more insistent on real foresters."

There were tears in Wetherford's eyes as he said: "You cannot realize what this mean, worn uniform means to me. For nine years I wore the prison stripes. It is ten years since I was dressed like a man."

"You need not worry about food or shelter for the present," replied Cavanagh gently. "Grain is not costly here, and house rent is less than nominal."

JUST PUBLISHED

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary, G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass., surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reinforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and simplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsurpassing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness, to aid of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

Neighborhood Notes

A very bad accident happened at the tannery last week. Carl Cummings, who is employed as a night fireman was engaged in oiling a fan in the engine room, when in some manner his right hand was caught in the fan, tearing the hand practically off at the wrist and splintering the bone of the arm so badly that immediate amputation was necessary. The unfortunate man was brought to Dr. Tew's office on Lake street and Dr. Tew and Dr. Boice took the arm off about six inches below the elbow.

Joseph Taylor, of Cadillac, a machinist in the employ of the Cadillac Machine Company, narrowly escaped death by asphyxiation one day last week while at work on the iron furnace of the Mitchell-Diggins Iron company. Feeling the death sleep stealing over him from the effects of the fatal gas, as he was working under the roof of the casting room, Taylor attempted to climb from his perilous position. He had clambered about ten feet down the ladder leading down to safety when his senses left him. In a crumpled heap he fell to the hard ground, thirty feet below. The workman landed squarely on his back. He sustained a fractured skull, serious cuts and bruises, probably internal injuries, and what may prove a broken shoulder, in addition to other wounds.

John R. H. recruiting officer for the United States army, who is stationed at the American House at Cadillac, discovered a man who could neither read nor write and when shown his name on a blank paper absently asked "What's that?"

Willis Thurman of Hazel Run, Mich. had wandered north and into the snow drifts of an icy climate. Unable to find the right kind of work after a several months' stay he hunted up the recruiting station and asked to be examined as he wanted to join the army. An examination disclosed him to be a perfect specimen of manhood and Officer Bush was congratulating himself upon securing such an excellent proportioned man when his gladness turned to sadness. Thurman could neither read nor write and had never spent a single day in a schoolroom. He had never seen a pen but had, at different times, he said, seen "fellows scratching with those wooden things." He left the recruiting station with very gloomy spirits.

While operating a Gordon folder in the office of the Herald & Record company of Traverse City, Arthur Newmarch met with a painful accident, by having his foot caught in the crank shaft. The first toe of his foot was cut off at the first joint and the second toe was badly lacerated. He was given medical attention at once and indications are that his recovery will be a speedy one.

E. L. Stafford, state deputy game warden, recently convicted William Cummings at Bellville in justice court, for using set lines in Grass Lake, Antrim county. Cummings pleaded guilty and paid a fine and costs.

CURE YOUR KIDNEYS
No Need to Take Any Further Risks.

Why will people continue to suffer the agony of kidney complaints, backache, urinary disorders, lameness, headaches, languor, why allow themselves to become chronic invalids, when a certain cure is offered them.

Doan's Kidney Pills is the remedy to use, because it gives to the kidneys the help they need to perform their work.

If you have any, even one, of the symptoms of kidney disease, cure yourself now, before diabetes, dropsy, or Bright's disease sets in. Can Charlevoix residents demand more convincing proof than the following:

Everett W. Davis, Maple St., Manicou, Mich., says: "I consider Doan's Kidney Pills to be a valuable kidney remedy. My back pained me severely and I had other symptoms of kidney complaint. Some time ago I obtained a box of Doan's Kidney Pills and it did not take long to relieve my aches and pains. I have no hesitation whatever in giving Doan's Kidney Pills my endorsement."

scribed by the business men and the farmers are contracting for acreage with a willingness that means success. A canvass has been made along the Traverse City road for about eight miles south of town and contracts for about 25 acres were secured. Mr. Nordham is well pleased with the situation and prospects here, and we feel that the plant will be a good thing for the business interests of Elk Rapids—Elk Rapids Progress.

As we go press we learn that fire totally destroyed the building and stock of the Vandenberg store at Essex. No particulars concerning the fire can be learned as the telephone into the store had burned out and so one at Elkworth has any news of the fire. It is understood that Mr. Vandenberg had about $2,000 worth of goods in the store and these were entirely destroyed. There was $600 insurance on the building but we could not learn whether any insurance was carried on the stock or not—Central Lake Torch.

Small Depositors

There are reasons why the management of this bank welcomes small depositors and consider it a matter of good business policy to give equal attention to small and large accounts.

In the first place, most of our large depositors started as small depositors. We have had the pleasure of seeing many accounts grow steadily over a period of years and are glad to say that we have helped our customers to increase their business and deposits.

As far as the bank is concerned, it is just as satisfactory to have several small accounts aggregating the same as one larger one, because, although there is three times the book-keeping involved, that is more than offset by the possibilities of development of these different accounts, besides the advertising value to the bank of these satisfied customers.

The officers will be glad to talk over banking relations with you at any time and pledge themselves to serve your interests faithfully when you trust your business to this bank.

CHAPTER XVI

CAVANAGH FOLLOWS HIS CHIEF.

At breakfast next morning Cavanagh said: "I must ride back and take some bread to the dog. I can't go away and leave him there without saying good-bye." "Let me do that," suggested Wetherford. "I'm afraid to go down to the fork. I reckon I'd better go back and tend the sheep till these sons of some one up to take my place."

"That might be too big to see Lize. Lize's voice showed great anxiety. She may be out her. I don't know. No, you'd better go down with me today," he urged. And at last the old man consented.

Putting some bread in his pockets, Cavanagh rode off up the trail to see how the dog and his flock were faring. He had not gone far when he heard the tinkle of the bells and the murmur of the flocks, and a few moments later the cattle came toward him with the air of a boy who, having assumed to disregard the orders of his master, expects a scolding. He plainly said: "I've brought my sheep to you because I was homesick. Please forgive me."

Cavanagh called to him cheerily and tossed him a piece of bread, which he caught in his teeth, but did not swallow. On the contrary, he held it while leaping for joy of the praise he heard in his new found master's voice.

Turning the flock upward toward the higher peaks, the ranger commanded the cattle to their heels and so, having released his promise, rode back to the cabin, where he found Wetherford saddled and ready for his momentous trip to the valley. He had shaved away his gray beard, and had lost been unprepared for these changes he would have been puzzled to account for this decidedly military figure sitting stately on his pony before the door.

"You can prove an alibi," he called as he drew near. "Gregg himself would never recognize you now."

Wetherford was in no mood for joking. "Lize will, I wore a mustache in the old days, and there's a scar on my chin."

As he rode he confided this strange thing to Cavanagh. "I know," said he, "that Lize is old and wrinkled, for I've seen her, but all the same I can't realize it. That heavy set woman down there is not Lize. My Lize is slim and straight. This woman whom you know has stolen her name and face, that's all. I can't explain exactly what I feel, but Lee Virginia means more to me now than Lize."

"I think I understand you," said Cavanagh, with sympathy in his voice. The nearer Wetherford came to the actual meeting with his wife the more he shook. At last he stopped in the road. "I don't believe I can do it," he declared. "I'll be like a ghost to her. What's the use of it? She'll only be worried by my story. I reckon I'd better keep dark to everybody. Let me go back. I'm plum scared cold."

While still he argued two men on horseback rounded a sharp turn in the trail and came face to face with the ranger. Wetherford's face went suddenly gray. "There's the deputy!" "Keep quiet, I'll do the talking," commanded Cavanagh, who was instant in his determination to shield the man. "Good morning, gentlemen," he called cheerily. "You're abroad early!"

The man in front was the deputy sheriff of the county; his companion was a stranger.

"That was a horrible mess you stumbled on over on Deer creek," the deputy remarked. "It certainly was. Have any arrests been made?"

"Not yet, but we're on a clew. This is Marshall Haines of Dallas, Mr. Cavanagh," pursued the deputy. The two men nodded in token of the introduction, and the deputy went on, "You remember that old cuss that used to work for Gregg?"

Again Cavanagh nodded. "Well, that chap is wanted by the Texas authorities. Mr. Haines here wants to see him mighty bad. He's an escaped convict with a bad record."

"Is that so?" exclaimed Cavanagh. "I thought he seemed a bit gun shy." "The last seen of him was when Sam Gregg sent him up to herd sheep. I think he was mixed up in that killing myself—and Bulford—and we're going up to get some flock of him. Didn't turn up at your station, did he?"

place tonight. You'll find the key hanging over the door. Go in and make yourself comfortable."

The deputy thanked him and was about to ride on when Cavanagh added: "I burned that Basque's tent and bedding for fear of contagion. His outfit was worthless anyhow. You'll find the sheep just above my cabin and the horse in my corral."

"The old man didn't take the horse, eh? Well, that settles it; he's sure at one of the camps. Much obliged. Good day."

As the two officers rode away Wetherford leaned heavily on his pommel and stared at the ranger with wide eyes. His face was drawn and his lips dry. "They'll get me! They'll get me!" he said.

"Oh, no, they won't," rejoined Cavanagh. "You're all right yet. They suspect nothing. How could they, with you in uniform and in my company?"

"All the same, I'm scared. That man Haines had his eyes on me every minute. He saw right through me. They'll get me, and they'll charge me up with that killing."

"No, they won't, I tell you," insisted the ranger. "Haines suspected nothing. I had his eye. He never saw you before and has nothing but a description to go by. You're clear up. Your uniform and your position with me will make you safe—perfectly safe. They'll find the Basque's camp burned and the sheep in charge of the dog, and they'll fancy that you have skipped across the range. But see here, old man, and he turned on him sharply. "You didn't tell me the whole truth. You said you were out on parole."

"I couldn't tell you the whole truth," replied the fugitive. "But I will now. I was in for a life sentence. I was desperate for the open air and home-sick for the mountains, and I struck down one of the guards. I was willing to do anything to get out. I thought if I could get back to this country and my wife and child I'd be safe. I said I'd be willing to go back to the pen if necessary, but I'm not. I can't do it. I'd die there. You must save me for my girl's sake."

His voice and eyes were wild with a kind of desperate fury of fear, and Cavanagh, moved to pity, assured him of his aid. "Now, listen," he said. "I'm going to shield you on account of your work for that poor shepherd and for your daughter's sake. It's my duty to apprehend you, of course, but I'm going to protect you. The safest thing for you to do is to go back to my cabin. Hide away, so as not to get there till they're gone. They'll ride over to the sawmill without doubt. If they come back this way remember that the deputy saw you only as a ragged old man with a long beard and that Haines has nothing but a printed description to go by. There's no use trying to flee. You are a marked man in that uniform, and you are safer right here with me than anywhere else—this side of Chicago. Haines is likely to cross the divide in the belief that you have gone that way, and if he does you have no one but the deputy to deal with."

He succeeded at last in completely rousing the other man's courage. Wetherford rose to meet his opportunity. "I'll do it," he said bravely.

"That's the talk!" exclaimed Cavanagh to encourage him. "You can throw them off the track this time, and when I come back tomorrow I'll bring some other clothing for you, and then we'll plan some kind of scheme that will get you out of the country. I'll not let them make a scapegoat of you."

The ranger watched the fugitive as he started back over the trail in this desperate defiance of his pursuers with far less confidence in the outcome than he had put into words.

"All depends on Wetherford himself. If his nerve does not fail him, if they take the uniform for granted and do not carry the matter to the supervisor, we will pull this plan through." And in this hope he rode away down the trail with bent head, for all this bore heavily upon his relationship to the girl waiting for him in the valley. He had thought Lize a burden, a social disability, but a convict father now made the mother's faults of small account.

The nearer he drew to the meeting with Lee Virginia the more important that meeting became. Cavanagh had seen Virginia hardly more than a score of times, and yet she filled his thoughts, confused his plans, making of his brain a place of doubt and hesitation. For her sake he had entered upon a plan to shield a criminal, to harbor an escaped convict. It was of no avail to argue that he was moved to shield Wetherford because of his heroic action on the peak. He knew perfectly well that it was because he could not see that fair, brave girl further disgraced by the discovery of her father's identity, for in the searching inquiry which would surely follow his secret would develop.

To marry her, knowing the character of her father and her mother, was madness, and the voice within him warned him of his folly. "Pure water cannot be drawn from corrupt sources," it is said. Nevertheless the thought of having the girl with him in the wilderness filled him with divine recklessness. While still he debated, alternately flushed with resolve to be happy and chilled by some strange defection, he met Swenson, the young guard who guarded the forest on the South Fork.

As he rode up Cavanagh perceived in the other man's face something profoundly serious. He did not smile in greeting, as was usual with him, and, taking some papers from his pocket, passed them over in ominous silence. He had a face of such bitterness that it broke through even the deerskin and set a shudder of dread in Cavanagh's heart.

"What's that?" he asked. "You look as if you'd lost a son or a daughter." "I have," said Swenson. "I lost a son."

"What's that?" he asked. "You look as if you'd lost a son or a daughter." "I have," said Swenson. "I lost a son."

"What's that?" he asked. "You look as if you'd lost a son or a daughter." "I have," said Swenson. "I lost a son."

out."

"What?"

"They've got him!" he exclaimed. "He's out."

Cavanagh sprang up. "I don't believe it! For what reason? Why?" "Don't that letter tell you? The whole town is chuckling. Every criminal and plug ugly in the country is splitting in our faces this morning. Yes, sir, the president has fired the chief—the man that built up this forestry service. The whole works is going to be— that's what it is. We'll have all the coal thieves, water power thieves, poschers and free grass pirates piling in on us in mobs. They'll eat up the forest. I see the finish of the whole business. They'll put some western man in— somebody they can work. Then where will we be?"

Cavanagh's young heart burned with indignation, but he tried to check the other man's torrent of protest. "I can't believe it. There's some mistake. Maybe they've made him the secretary of the department or something."

"No, they haven't. They've thrown him out. They've downed him because he tried to head off some thieves of coal mines in Alaska. The man was ready to weep with chagrin and indignant sorrow. His voice choked, and he turned away to conceal his emotion.

Cavanagh put the letter back into his pocket and mounted his horse. "Well, go on back to your work, Swenson. I'm going to town to get the supervisor on the wire and find out what it all means."

He was almost as badly stunned by the significance of Swenson's news as Swenson himself. Could it be possible that the man who had built up the field service of the bureau—the man whose clean handed patriotism had held the boys together, making them every year more clearly a unit, a little army of enthusiasts—could it be possible that the originator, the organizer of this great plan, had been stricken down just when his influence was of most account? He refused to believe it of an administration pledged to the cause of conservation.

As he entered the town he was struck instantly by the change in the faces turned toward him, in the joyful greetings hurled at him. "Hello, Mr. Cossack! What do you think of your chief now?"

"This will put an end to your infernal nonsense," said another. "We'll have a man in there now who knows the western ways and who's willing to boom things along. The cork is out of your forest bottle."

Gregg was most offensive of all. "This means throwing open the forest to anybody that wants to use it— means an entire reversal of this fool policy."

"Wait and see," replied Cavanagh. But his face was rigid with the expression of the fear and anger he felt. With hands that trembled he opened the door to the telephone booth, closed it carefully behind him and called for the supervisor's office. As soon as Redfield replied he burst forth in question, "Is it true that the chief is out?"

Redfield's voice was husky as he replied. "Yes, lad; they've got him."

"Good Lord, what a blow to the service!" exclaimed Cavanagh with a groan of sorrow and rage. "What is the president thinking of to throw out the only man who stood for the future—the man who had built up this corps, who was its inspiration?" Then after a pause he added, with bitter resolution: "This ends it for me. Here's where I get off."

"Don't say that, boy. We need you now more than ever."

Dumas' Onion Soup.

Onion soup is often liked by people who disdain the savory herbs in any other form. There is no doubt of the wholesomeness of the onion, and those who have never tried the soup are recommended to use this celebrated recipe of the elder Dumas: Take, for three pints of soup, four Bermuda onions or eight common white ones, unpeeled and fry to a golden brown in two tablespoonfuls of butter. Pour in two quarts of water, season with pepper and salt and boil until the onions are quite soft. Beat the yolks of three eggs, mix with the soup and pour the mixture over finger slices of toasted bread. Milk may be used instead of water in this soup.

I caught a lot of them.

THEATRICAL

Last Friday night the theatre-goers were presented with the beautiful classic, Danton and Pythias, by a clever amateur cast under the direction of Will H. Griffin, for the benefit of the Knight of Pythias lodge of this city. Every character was ably handled and the costumes were extremely elaborate. To this cast much credit must be given for even attempting to learn this classic, owing to the continued lines of blank verse, the most difficult material to memorize in the dramatic art, if to anyone the character work was not to their expectations. We trust more such attractions may be seen in Charlevoix.

"What Happened to Smith" to be given, March 22 by the Senior Class of Charlevoix High School is to be the event of the season. Don't miss it. The following is a brief sketch of the play:

John Smith lives at 19 Mona Mansions, Kensington, and at the beginning of the play his wife, Nora, is absent on a visit to Dover. The Rev. John Smith during the absence of his wife, Mabel takes flat No. 60 Mona Mansions. His wife returning unexpectedly gets into the flat belonging to the other Mr. Smith. A number of amusing complications follow in which several of the characters barely escape arrest as thieves. An explanation is finally made revealing the fact that there are two Mr. Smiths in Mona Mansions and the joke is on everybody. Come and have a good time.

THE X L PRODUCE CO.

There is a creamery by the lake. Great pride in which the farmers take.

They do it, yes, they do.

The X L Produce Co., runs the business.

Don't you see they do.

They do, yes they do.

They will sell you butter, milk and cream.

And everything is very neat and clean.

And when the grass is nice and green.

'Tis good for making your ice cream.

It is, yes it is.

They will buy your hay or sell your feed.

And they gather up milk with the greatest speed.

They do, yes they do.

They have no cattle of their own.

But depend upon farmers trade alone.

The quantity, whether great or small.

They are sure to give each one a call.

They are, yes they are.

So if you want a quart of milk.

And that which is as fine as silk.

A roll of butter fresh and sweet.

A nice big cheese all clean and neat.

Just call 270 over the phone.

And they will bring your order to your home.

They will, yes they will.

There is an old saying that has been handed down.

That comes from the old ancient bogs.

Oh buying a quart of milk from a man.

And getting two tall grown frogs.

There is, yes there is.

But let that pass there is a moral to this.

And we don't care a cent for the bogs.

But buy milk from the Block Boys.

And I tell you now.

You are buying pure milk, not frogs.

You are, yes you are.

SINKING OF THE FISH TUG HOPE

Complete Particulars of the Terrible Disaster of Last Week.

FROM THE GLOUCESTER DAILY TIMES

Captain of Heckman Says Accident Was Unavoidable.

Captain Anderson, George Wiggin, Ernest
Anderson and John Chambers
All Drowned.

The Gloucester Daily Times gives the following details of the sinking of the fish tug Hope in a collision with the schooner Heckman: Captain Peter Nelson of the Heckman in an interview with a representative of the Times, made the following statement: He was much affected by the terrible consequences of the accident, but felt on the part of himself and his crew the disaster was unavoidable and that he was not at fault, but on the other hand, did all he could to avert it.

The captain said that the Heckman had, only a short time before, dropped the tow-boat and was standing across the harbor, close hauled and on the starboard tack, the direction of the wind making it necessary to beat out of the harbor.

On deck with him was Peter Bushie and one other of the crew, the rest being below. Bushie remarked to him, "What's that fellow going to do, skipper, cross our bow?" He looked and saw the gasoline boat with a big horse on her, coming rapidly toward the Heckman. He was at the wheel himself and said to Bushie, "Go forward and see if you can see anybody on her." Bushie went forward and shouted back that he couldn't see a soul.

All this time the gasoline boat kept coming nearer and acted in what the captain called a peculiar manner, sawing and going one way and then the other he says. He did not know what to make of it, and watching her closely, but she kept coming nearer and apparently at a fast rate. Captain Nelson says that of course he supposed someone on her would notice the vessel and change her course, but this did not happen, and she came into such close quarters that a collision looked unavoidable.

When it seemed that nothing could prevent the gasoline boat from getting caught under the bow of the Heckman or striking her he put his wheel hard up so as to bring his craft side to side and heading in the same direction the gasoline craft was going, figuring that should a collision happen the crafts would be side to each other and he would have a good chance to save whoever was on her should that become necessary.

Just as he put his wheel hard up, the gasoline boat took another broad sweep and ranged right under the bow of the Heckman, whose bowsprit first came in contact with the mast of the little craft and then the bowsprit came down on the big house, which practically covered her hull. The force of the blow careened the Hope and she went well down and under and soon the house or part of it and other wreckage showed on the surface and clinging to it were two men.

Capt. Nelson soon had his craft up in the wind and shouted to the two struggling men to hang on and he would get them. The story of the Heckman was got over and was soon alongside the wreck and the two men were taken off and brought on board the Heckman. It could then be seen that they were pretty far gone, both being unconscious, and the men of the Heckman rolled them and worked hard to get the spark of life to show.

Then Capt. King and his life saving crew, one of whom had witnessed the accident from his patrol on shore, came off in a life boat and they worked with all their skill and energy. All this time the vessel was coming up the harbor and Mrs. S. F. Quimby, Morrow and Hallett, who had been hastily summoned, were taken out on board and they too labored in vain to summon back the life spark.

The bodies were placed in the life boat and landed at the ferry ship. Here they were identified as Charles Anderson, the captain of the Hope and John Chambers, one of the crew. Up to this time, it had not been known which one of the fleet of the gasoline netting boats had met with the disaster, but the identification of Capt. Anderson and Chambers told that it was the Hope which had gone down.

The four lost men are: Capt. Charles Anderson, skipper and owner of the lost craft, 38 years of age resided at 254 Main street, where he leaves a widow.

Ernest Anderson, brother of the master, 29 years of age, single, belonged in Charlevoix, Mich., having come here but four days ago to engage in the net fishery in the Hope, with his brother.

George Wiggin, single, 22 years of age, boarded with Capt. Anderson and belonged at Charlevoix, where he has a father. He had been working on the wharf on the nets which these crafts carry, about all the season, but for the past few days had been out to the craft in place of one Newbury, who had been one of the regular crew and had been in her all the time up to a day or two ago.

John Chambers, between 45 and 50 years of age, belonged in Boothbay Harbor, where he leaves a widow. He also has two sons, one of whom is assistant engineer in a big electric plant in New Haven, Conn. He had been one of the crew of the steamer Nomad all winter, but about a month ago shifted over and shipped in the Hope.

SPARE THE BEES

State Law Prescribes a Heavy Fine for Spraying Trees.

When in Blossom—Is Injurious in Many Ways —Letter From Prof. Tah.

Great interest is being shown everywhere in the spraying of orchards, and here and there farmers are planning to spray the trees while in blossom. This should never be done and for several good reasons: First, there is a state law which prescribes a fine of ten to one hundred dollars, or imprisonment for ten to ninety days, or both, if fruit trees are sprayed while in blossom. Complaint may be made to any justice of the peace, or other competent court, by any person.

Second, and the reason for the law, when trees are sprayed with poisonous solution, the bees are destroyed, thus causing great loss to the owners, as well as to the owners of fruit trees, since the bees are required to fertilize the flowers.

Third, spraying while trees are in blossom often injures the flowers so that the fruit will not set.

Fourth, the person who sprays at this time thinks he will be better able to destroy the apple worm than that later on. This is not the case. The poison must enter the calyx cup, but this is not possible until after the stamens have withered. The apple worm does not hatch until three or four weeks after the fruit has set, and although it is well to spray within ten days after the fruit has set, or before the lobes of the calyx have closed, it is a poor practice from every point of view to spray fruit trees while they are in blossom.

The only case in which spraying might be advisable is when the trees were not sprayed just before the blossoms opened. Then a weak solution of lime-sulphur might be used to control the apple scab but no poison should be used until after the petals have dropped.

L. R. TAFT,
State Inspector of Orchards and Nurseries.

FOR FISHERMAN

Text of Regulation Between United States and Canada

International Agreement Which is About to be Ratified by Both Countries.

With the international agreement relating to fishing in international waters between the United States and Canada at last in the form that it will probably be ratified by both countries to take effect in January, 1912, it is interesting to know what restrictions it places on the fishing industry. The joint agreement will apply to the Great Lakes except Lake Michigan. The "don't" for fishermen contained in the regulations are:

Don't catch whitefish weighing less than two pounds.

Lake trout less than that weight.

Yellow pike less than 13 inches long.

Sauger, calico bass, or white bass less than 10 inches long.

Lake or channel catfish less than 10 inches long.

Black bass less than 10 inches long.

Brook trout less than seven inches long.

Muskellunge less than 21 inches long.

Any black bass at all from March 15 to June 15 in each year.

Use dynamite or poison.

Pollute international waters.

Fail to throw back into the water any illegal fish caught.

Use nets on the spawning grounds of black bass.

Set nets through or under the ice.

Take salmon or steelhead of less than three pounds weight.

Use a net or weir or fish wheel to take the same.

Catch any sturgeon at all from January 1, 1912.

Catch good fish for fertilizer.

Use a spear or grappling hook or naked hook or artificial bait with more than three hooks or more than one barb on three hooks.

Use a torch or light to lure fish.

The man who violates any of these don'ts will be liable to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment of not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court. At least this is the penalty provided in the bill reported by Senator Smith, St. Ignace Enterprise.

STANDS NO SHOW

Poor Men Should Keep Out of the Mach Boomed West

Letter Which Will Repay Careful Thoughtful Perusal.

The following letter from L. L. Lydell to George Pray of Traverse City is worth careful perusal by those who are contemplating seeking their fortunes in the west:

Gladstone, Ore., March 3, 1911.

Mr. George E. Pray:

Dear sir: First you ask why I don't come back to Michigan. None of that cold weather for me. The coldest weather in California for six years was 28 above. This winter in Oregon 22 above was the coldest.

Now, in regard to the new country you are looking for. There is no new country here. You have to stop east of the coast range of mountains to find new country, and I don't know anything about that country there. This is not the wild and woolly west—it is an older country than Michigan, and it is fine. But land! Say, improved land is out of sight, $75 to $100 per acre. Portland is going to boom this summer again.

Talk about money! They make things hum when they go at it. They figure by the millions. A poor man don't stand much show, and I want to say this. There will be thousands of dollars worth of advertisements sent east this spring booming the country. Now, don't you or anyone else believe one-tenth part of it; you tell them this for me, if they want to come west, don't sell off a thing, but come and look before you come to stay. I have seen more poor men stuck here than any other country I was in. Just by selling out and having only money enough to get here with, expecting to pick up twenty dollar gold pieces in the road or some other place; just on account of the boom advertisements which are all graft to get people out here and then skin them.

—Then there is another side of it: A man can come out here with a little money, say $2,000 and get him a small piece of land and do very well. Then there is another: a good tradesman can do very well here because everything is on the boom. But let hard times set in and I tell you they will be up against it. From your old friend,
L. L. LYDELL.

HORSES ARE HIGH PRICED.

Buyers Complain of Great Scarcity of Good Draft Animals.

It is said by old horsemen who are in a position to know what they are talking about that horses are now as high in price as they were during war times and that a good animal costs from $200 to $300 and that they are very hard to get even at that price.

A southern Michigan official reports that there is a big boom in the price of horses all over the country.

At this rate horses will soon become a more expensive luxury than automobiles and some time in the future, if the prices on autos continue to drop, even an editor may sport a "finz buggy" who knows.

BOOM MICHIGAN WHEAT

Millers' Association Seeks to Have More Home Grown Flour Used in Institutions.

The Michigan State Millers' Association is bringing pressure to bear upon state authorities to induce the management of state institutions to buy more of the wheat raised in Michigan than has heretofore been the case. The secretary has issued a report showing the percentage of spring and winter wheat purchased last year by the various state institutions. With the exception of four cases, the greater percentage is spring wheat grown in the west.

The state sanatorium for tuberculosis consumed 19 barrels of winter wheat during 1910, a total of 100 per cent. The state asylum at Ionia consumed 245 barrels, all winter wheat. The eastern Michigan asylum consumed 53 per cent of winter wheat and 45 per cent of spring wheat. The Michigan State Public school at Coldwater consumed 131 barrels in 1910, 59 per cent winter wheat and 41 per cent spring wheat. All other institutions use more

The production of Damon and Pythias here by members of Pine Lake Lodge K. of P., under the direction of Will H. Only the speaking parts will be taken, the army and senate to be recruited from Traverse City talent.

The Courier can assure Traverse City people of a rare treat. It is a great drama, telling a heart gripping story of patriotism, friendship and love, and the troupe that staged it here, will give Traverse City as good a rendition as they could see, except at the hands of the way-up stars in the professional line who never visit the smaller cities.

VAN HAS GONE HOME

Kept Mum in Regard to His Plans But Was Mighty Busy

Something Will be Doing Next Summer or the Courier is on a Wrong Trail.

Mr. Stacks, master of the business men's dinner, said that whenever Van Pelt came to town there was something doing. Van has come and gone. We tried hard to find out what he was doing or going to do but Van was mum.

About eighteen months ago he put up a new home for the Courier and we felt kindly toward him for it, but when the rains descended and the floods came down upon us, on account of imperfect roofing, we got sore. So did Van, and this trip he put on a new roof and we now keep dry. This much we do know and feel grateful to Van and Glassford.

We also know that Van is going to be up about the middle of May, and that he is going to bring his auto with him and that he will offer it for sale and then buy a bigger one. After he bought his first machine he built us a handsome postoffice and frame what we have gathered and read between the lines we guess we can safely predict that before the summer is over Van will be engaged in putting up a nice forty foot store for a prominent merchant. It's a guess on our part, but the Courier will have a live dollar hat from Van on our new postoffice, and we offered to renew the bet on the new building. Watch and see how our prediction comes out.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND
Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

"I'm through—I'm done with America—with the States. I shall write my resignation at once. Send down another man to take my place."

Redfield's pleadings were of no avail. Cavanagh went directly from the booth to the postoffice, and there, surrounded by jeering and exultant citizens, he penned his resignation and mailed it. Then, with stern and contemptuous face, he left the place, making no reply to the jeers of his enemies, and, mounting his horse, mechanically rode away out upon the plains, seeking the quiet, open places in order to regain calmness and decision. He did not deliberately ride away from Lee Virginia, but as he entered upon the open country he knew that he was leaving her as he was leaving the forests.

He had cut himself off from her as he had cut himself off from the work he loved. His heart was swollen big within his breast. He longed for the return of "the rule" to the White House. "What manner of ruler is this who is ready to strike down the man whose very name means conservation and who in a few years would have made this body of forest rangers the most effective corps of its size in the world?" He groaned again, and his throat ached with the fury of his indignation.

"Dismissed for insubordination," the report said. "In what way? Truly in making war on greed, in checking graft, in preserving the heritage of the people."

The lash that cut deepest was the open exultation of the very men whose persistent attempt to appropriate public property the chief had helped to thwart. "Kidnapped will go next. The influence that got the chief will get Hugh. He's too good a man to escape. Then, as Swenson says, the thieves will roll in upon us to slash and burn and corrupt. What a country! What a country!"

As he reached the end of this line of despairing thought he came back to the question of his remaining personal obligations. Wetherford must be cared for, and then—then—there was Virginia waiting for him at this moment.

"For her sake, to save her from humiliation, I will help her father to freedom."

This brought him back to the hideous tragedy of the helghis, and with that thought the last shred of faith in the sense of justice in the state vanished.

"They will never discover those murderers. They will permit this outrage to pass unpunished, like the others. It will be merely another 'dramatic incident' in the history of the range."

His pony of his own accord turned and by a circuitous route headed at last for the home canyon as if it knew its master's wavering mind. Cavanagh observed what he was doing, but his hand did not intervene. Helpless to make the decision himself, he welcomed the intervention of the homing instinct of his horse. With bent head and lowering face he returned to the silence of the trail and the loneliness of the hills.

CHAPTER XVII.

Cavanagh's Last Vigil Begins.

ON his solitary ride upward and homeward the ranger searched his heart and found it bitter and desolate. Love had interfered with duty, and pride had checked and defeated love. His path, no longer clear and definite, looped away aimlessly, lost in vague, obscure meanderings. His world had suddenly grown gray. He had no trade, no business, no special skill save in the ways of the mountaineer, and to return to his ancestral home in England at the moment seemed a awful confession of failure.

It was again dusk as he rode up to his own hunching pole and slipped from the saddle.

Wetherford came out, indicating by his manner that he had recovered his confidence once more. "How did you find things in the valley?" he inquired as they walked away toward the corral.

"Bad," responded the ranger.

"In what way?"

"The chief has been dismissed, and all the rangers are chuckling with glee. I've resigned from the service."

"Wetherford was angry. 'What for?' 'I will not serve under any other chief. The best thing for you to do is to go on when I do—I think by keeping on that uniform you can get to the trail with me.'"

"Did you see Lize and my girl?"

"No; I only remained in town a minute. It was too hot for me. I'm done with it. Wetherford, I'm going back to civilization. No more wild west for me." The bitterness of his voice touched the older man's heart, but he considered it merely a mood.

"Don't lose your nerve. Maybe this ends the reign of terror."

"Nothing will end the moral shiftlessness of this country but the death of the freebooter. That job was done by men who hated the daggers—hated 'em because they were rival claimants for the range. It's nonsense to attempt to fasten it on men like Nell Ballard. The men who did that piece of work are well known stock owners."

"I reckon that's so."

"Well, now, who's going to convict them? I can't do it. I'm going to pull out as soon as I can put my books in shape, and you'd better go too."

They were standing at the gate of the corral, and the roar of the mountain stream enveloped them in a cloud of sound.

Wetherford spoke slowly: "I hate to lose my girl now that I've seen her, but I guess you're right. And Lize, poor old critter! It's a shame the way I've queer'd her life, and I'd give my right arm to be where I was twelve years ago, but with a price on my head and old age coming on I don't see myself ever again getting up to par. It's a losing game for me now."

There was resignation as well as despair in his voice, and Cavanagh felt it, but he said: "There's one other question that may come up for decision. If that Bessie died of smallpox you may possibly take it."

"I've figured on that, but it will take a day or two to show on me. I don't feel any ache in my bones yet. If I do come down you keep away from me. You've got to live and take care of Virginia."

"She should never have returned to this accursed country," Cavanagh harshly replied, starting back toward the cabin.

The constable, smoking his pipe beside the fireplace, did not present an anxious face. On the contrary, he seemed plumply content as he replied to the ranger's comment as he replied to the ranger's comment.

clear of town," said Cavanagh. "They'll quarantine us sure."

Wetherford now that the danger of arrest was over was disposed to be grimly humorous. "There's no great loss without some small gain. I don't think we'll be troubled by any more visitors, not even by sheriffs or doctors. I reckon you and I are in for a couple of months of the quiet life—the kind we read about."

Cavanagh now that he was definitely out of the forest service perceived the weight of every objection which his friends and relatives had made against his going into it. It was a lonely life and must ever be so. It was all very well for a young unmarried man who loved the woods and hills beyond all things else and who could wait for advancement, but it was a sad place for one who desired a wife. The ranger's place was on the trail and in the hills, and to bring a woman into these high silences, into these lone reaches of forest and fell, would be cruel. To bring children into them would be criminal.

All the next day, while Wetherford pattered about the cabin or the yard, Cavanagh toiled at his papers, resolved to leave everything in the perfect order which he loved. Whenever he looked round upon his belongings, each and all so resilient of the wilderness, he found them very dear. His chairs, which he had rived out of staves; his guns, his robes, his saddles and their accoutrements—all meant much to him.

"Some of them must go with me," he said, "and I am settled down in the old house I'll have one room to myself which shall be so completely of the mountain America that when I am within it I can fancy myself back in the camp."

He thought of South Africa as a possibility and put it aside, knowing well that no other place could have the same intangible charm that the rocky mountains possessed for the reason that he had come to them at his most impressionable age. Then, too, the United States, for all its faults, seemed merely an extension of the English form of government.

Wetherford was also moving in deep thought and at last put his perplexity into a question. "What am I to do? I'm beginning to feel queer. I reckon the chances for my having smallpox are pretty fair. Maybe I'd better drop down to Sulpur and report to the authorities. I've got a day or two before the blossoms will begin to show on me."

Cavanagh studied him closely. "Now, don't get to thinking you've got it. I don't see how you could catch a germ. The high altitude and the winds up there ought to prevent infection. I'm not afraid for myself, but if you're able perhaps we'll better pull out tomorrow."

Later in the day Wetherford expressed deeper dejection. "I don't see any thing ahead of me anyhow," he confessed. "If I go back to the post I'll die of lung trouble, and I don't know how I'm going to earn a living in the city. Maybe the best thing I could do would be to take the box and go under. I'm afraid of big towns," he confessed. "I always was, even when I had money. Now that I am old and broke I don't go any more."

Cavanagh's shoulders gave away. "But, man, you can't stay here. I'm packing up to leave. Your only chance of getting out of the country is to go when I go and in my company." His voice was harsh and keen, and the old man felt his color, but he made no reply, and this sad silence moved Cavanagh to repentance. His gentleness warned him of something deeply changing in his own nature.

Approaching the brooding feline, he spoke gently and sadly. "I'm sorry for you, Wetherford, I sure am, but it's up to you to get clear away so that Lee will never by any possible chance find out that you are alive. She has a romantic notion of you as a representative of the old time west, and it would be a dreadful shock to her if she knew you as you are. It's hard to leave her, I know, now that you've seen her, but that's the main thing to do—the only thing to do."

"Oh, you're right of course you're right. But I wish I could be of some use to her. I wish I could kind of keep watch over her. I'd be glad enough to play the sentinel in her kitchen." But if you're going to take her—

"But I'm not," protested Ross. "I'm going to leave her right here. I can't take her."

Wetherford looked at him with steady eyes, into which a keen light leaped. "Don't you intend to marry her?"

Hoss turned away. "No; I don't. I mean it's impossible."

"Why not? Don't tell me you're not nearly married?" He said this with denigrating tone.

"No; I'm not married, but— He stopped without making his meaning plain. "I'm going to leave the country and—"

Wetherford caught him up. "I reckon I understand what you mean. You consider Lize and me undesirable parents—not just the kind you'd cut out of the herd of your own free will. Well, that's all right. I don't blame you so far as I'm concerned. But you can forget me—consider me a dead one. I'll never bother her nor you."

Cavanagh threw out an invitation

mand. "It is impossible," he protested. "It's better for her and better for me that I should do so. I'm going back to my own people."

Wetherford was thoroughly roused now. Some part of his old time fire seemed to return to him. He rose from his chair and approached the ranger firmly. "I've seen you act like a man, Ross Cavanagh. You've been a good partner these last few days—a son couldn't have treated me better—and I hate to think of you. But my girl loves you—I could see that. I could see her lean to you."

Ross said slowly: "It will be hard for you to understand when I tell you that I care a great deal for your daughter. I'm a man like you—an Englishman—cannot marry, or he ought not to marry—for himself alone. There are so many others to consider his friends, his sisters."

Wetherford dropped his hand. "I see." His tone was despairing. "When I was young we married the girls we loved in defiance of everything. But you are not that kind. You may be right. I'm nothing but a debilitated old cowpuncher, branded by the state—a man who threw away his chance—but I can tell you straight I've learned that nothing but the love of a woman counts."

In the moonlight Lee Virginia waited with her eyes fixed on Wetherford, expecting Ross Cavanagh's return, expecting

There is one bill now pending before the legislature which is of vital interest to Charlevoix county.

We refer to the senate bill No. 245 introduced by Senator Forster. The bill allows the board of supervisors to appropriate a limited amount of money for the purpose of advertising the agricultural resources of their counties. The board of supervisors of this county last fall made an appropriation for that purpose but discovered that the law at present does not allow them to do so.

The limited amount to only a few cents on each thousand valuation and the returns would be a hundred fold. Write Senator Scott and Representative Pearson asking for the passage of senate bill 215.

CHARLEVOIX county is well represented at Lansing this session. Representative Pearson is one of the men whose advice is always asked for on all important matters of legislation and is known as one of the leaders of the house. Senator Scott has rapidly forged ahead and no senator serving his first term is more influential or has taken a more important part in legislation. Just keep your eye on Scott.

Neighborhood Notes

A bill has been introduced in the legislature to make a new county to be known as Forest, by taking six townships of Cheboygan and Presque Isle. A feud over the county line caused the action.

Auditor General Fuller has received $115,000 from the Michigan State Telephone company in payment of the balance due the state on the state tax assessed last year under the ad valorem law, and $16,000 interest.

State officials view this payment as marking the end of the attempt by this company to contest its taxes.

The corporation paid $100,000 of the tax at the time the suit was instituted to contest the tax. None of the other companies has paid.

Next April $237,000 more will be due from the Michigan company.

A recent Lansing dispatch to the Detroit papers says: "Prosecuting Attorney Hayden of Ingham county has discovered, he asserts, that a number of the members of the Michigan legislature have been smuggling liquor into Lansing, which is situated in 'dry' territory and he stated today that fifteen days after the session is over, he would issue the warrants for the arrest of the representatives. Under the Michigan statutes a member is immune during the session and for fifteen days after its conclusion, and the prosecuting attorney is powerless to act at the present time. This is the first time the legislature has met in a county where local option is in effect, and the thirty-one have been bringing in liquid refreshments and giving them away to friends in a manner that has caused the local authorities to gasp."

The supreme court has reversed the conviction of Sylvester Hickman of Jackson, a former saloonkeeper in that city, who opened a soft drink establishment after local option went into effect. He was charged with violation of the liquor laws and testimony on which he was convicted in the circuit court showed that he had an unopened case of beer in the place and a bottle of beer on ice under the counter. The high court says the evidence was not sufficient to show that he was selling the beer and Hickman was ordered discharged.

Will A. McDowell, publisher of the Tustar Times, sued Andrew J. Minzey, proprietor of the Mathews house in Lathrup, for back subscription on his paper. Minzey's defense was that when the time for which he had paid up McDowell should have stopped the paper but admitted he had continued to take it from the postoffice. The court held it was an implied contract and held good against Minzey so long as he accepted the paper. The jury gave a judgment for the full amount claimed. Later Minzey paid the account in full and also advanced his subscription a year on the Times books. To cap the climax and show McDowell and his witnesses with an oyster supper before they started on their return trip to Tustin. Minzey is what McDowell calls a good loser and the two men are now fast friends.—Mancelona Herald.

Mr. Coats, the civil engineer and so called water works expert, has been living in C. L. Bailey's cottage at Clam lake all winter and making himself generally useful. First, he discovered a wonderful mineral spring on the place with water that would cure all the ills the human family is heir to, and C. L. at once began to dream of great fame and wealth untold, but it is all off now. The water expert and the lawyer don't speak now when they pass. It seems that Coats has been cutting down some of Bailey's choice shade trees, which act made the latter real angry and he forthwith had a warrant issued and Coats was bound over to the circuit court for trial on a charge of trespass or damage to his summer home. Now it is reported the woman has informed and Coats has had Bailey arrested on a charge of false imprisonment claiming that he was making artistic improvements on the latter's resort at his request. There is evidently blood on the moon and the end is not yet. At least the trials will give employment to some good lawyers provided the parties interested are determined to fight to the bitter end.—Mancelona Herald.

In an opinion rendered lately the supreme court sustained the opinion of the circuit judge of Delta county in the case of Francis I. Baldwin, editor of the Escanaba Journal, against the Escanaba Liquor Dealers' association. When Baldwin secured control of the paper in 1906, he started a vigorous crusade against the saloon men of that city, and it was claimed that they instituted a boycott against him. Baldwin started suit in the circuit court and sustained a judgment of $1,000 and judgment was affirmed by the supreme court Monday. The members of the Liquor Dealers' association are required to refrain from further prosecution of Baldwin and are charged with the cost of the suit.

Over-working the Future Tense.

Some one said that the liquorites could not keep shop without the future tense. They tell us they are going to quit selling goods to dives that they are going to drive the disreputable saloonkeepers out of business, that they are going to obey the laws, suppress "ladies parlors" and gambling, are going to stop selling to minors, to fight bootlegging, to elevate the business and make it eminently respectable. There might be some hope even in this futurity did they not tell us in the same breath, "No matter what laws may be made to cripple the beverages industries of our present time, they cannot and will not be observed by those managing these industries."—Brewers' Journal, New York.

And "saloonkeepers like bankers, merchants, manufacturers, railway companies, oil magnates, and men in general, will violate laws if it pays, but no man will violate laws if he knows it will not pay."—President Gilmore, of the Modern License League.

What matters the deluge of meaningless promises for the future in the face of the declarations of those managing the business? There is no hope in them. Let no one be deceived thereby.

A Chicago man leased a building to a brewery company. The brewery company sublet it to a saloonkeeper and a keeper of a evil resort. A man was arrested for taking a young girl to this place, but the evidence was not sufficient for conviction. Thereupon the jury—sent back all the intermediate sinners and indicted the owner of the building. He protests that he is not responsible, and probably the brewery company would make the same defense; but the law holds otherwise.

Literary Notes

Paper Plaster and How to Use It.

"Paper plaster is one of the most useful and durable mediums for decorations," says Woman's Home Companion for March. "It may be used on small or large surfaces, and even in unskilled hands charming results may be produced with it."

"Take old newspapers and tear them into very small pieces. Put a mass of them in a tub of water and allow them to soak over night. In the morning put the whole mass through the meat chopper. Wet it again so as to make it pliable like plaster. Practice modeling the paper into different shapes while it is in this state, but remember, of course, that it will not be permanently cohesive. After you have learned to handle the pulp like this with a glue. It will remain soft for some days and can be molded without haste, but as time goes on the molded plaster will become hard."

"Old glass bottles may be covered with the plaster and decorated in any way you may fancy. Well-shaped jars may be decorated with designs of fruit or flowers. When the pulp dries, it takes on an attractive bronzy color without treatment of any sort. Soft brown or green dyes may be worked in with the plaster, however, and produce charming effects."

"Glove or handkerchief cases may be made from ordinary wooden boxes. For a handkerchief case, cover a cigar box with the paper pulp, working in some simple and appropriate design, punching it and modeling into shape. For this purpose use a narrow paperknife and make the more delicate touches with the flattened end of an orange stick. Pad and line the inside of the box with silk."

"Very pretty bas-relief effects may be made with the plaster. It may even be used in executing low-relief wall designs for borders or friezes. If you wish a conventional design or figure, cut out as many patterns of the same design as you will need for the space to be covered. Paste these securely on the surface to be decorated and mold the pulp over them. Keeping the pulp neatly within the lines will insure accuracy and uniformity. When the design is modeled, the pulp may be colored with water-colors, dabbed on with a sponge or with a large soft brush."

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

each noon to see him appear at the door. But when three days passed without word or sign from him her uneasiness deepened into alarm. The whole town was profoundly excited over the murder, that she knew, and she began to fear that some of the ranger's friends had worried the boy and will upon him.

With this vague fear in her heart she went forth into the street to inquire. One of the first men she met was Sifton, who was sitting on a bench outside the lively hotel door, smoking a pipe, and looking at the clock. "Have you seen Mr. Cavanagh?"

"Yes," he answered, "I saw him yesterday, just after dinner, down at the postoffice. He was writing a letter at the desk. Almost immediately afterward he mounted and rode away. He was much cut up over his chief's dismissal."

"Why has he not written to me?" she asked herself, "and why should he have gone away without a word of greeting—explanation or goodbye? It would have been but a moment's time to call at the door."

The more she dwelt upon this neglect the more significant it became. After the tender look in his eyes, after the ardent clasp of his hand, she thought that he could be so indifferent was at once a source of pain and self reproach.

With childish frankness she went to Lize and told her what she had learned, her eyes dim with hot tears. "Ross came to town and went away back to his cabin without coming to see me."

"Are you sure he's been here?"

"Yes, he came in, got some letters at the postoffice, and then rode away." Her voice broke as her disappointment and grief overcame her.

Lize struggled to a sitting position. "There's some mistake about this. Ross Cavanagh never was the whiling kind of man. You've got to remember he's our man. Probably the letter was some order that carried him right back to his work."

"But if he had really cared he could have ridden by to say just a word. But he didn't. He went away without a sign after promising to come." She buried her face in the coverlet of her mother's bed and wept in childish grief and despair.

Lize was forced to acknowledge that the ranger's action was inexplicable, but she did her best to make light of it. "He may have hurried to town on some errand and hadn't a moment to spare. These are exciting days for him, remember. He'll be in tomorrow sure."

With a faint hope of this the girl rose and went about her daily tasks, but the day passed and another without word or sign of the recent lover, and each day brought a deeper sense of loss, but her pride would not permit her to show her grief.

Young Gregg, without knowing in the least the cause of her troubled face, took this occasion to offer comfort. His manner toward her had changed since she no longer had a part in the management of the eating house, and for that reason she did not repulse him as sharply as she had been wont to do. He really bore Cavanagh no ill will and was, indeed, shrewd enough to understand that Lee admired the ranger and that his own courtship was rather hopeless. Nevertheless he persisted, his respect for her growing as he found her steadfast in her refusal to permit any familiarity.

"See here, Miss Virginia," he cried as she was passing him in the hall, "I can see you're worried about Lize. I mean your mother—and if I can be of any use I hope you'll call on me." As she thanked him without enthusiasm he added, "How is she tonight?"

"I think she's better."

"Can I see her?"

His tone was so earnest that the girl was moved to say, "I'll ask her."

"I wish you would. I want to say something to her."

Lize's mother, who was in the room, stood. "Come in, Joe, the door's open."

He accepted her invitation rather awkwardly but his face was impassive as he looked down upon her.

"Well, how about it?" she asked.

"What's doing in the town?"

"Not much of anything except talk. The whole country is buzzing over this dismissal of the chief forester."

"They'd better be doing something about that murder."

"They are. They're going up there in streams to see where the work was done. The coroner's inquest was held yesterday." He grinned. "Parties came to their death by persons unknown."

Lize recoiled. "It's a wonder they don't charge it up to Ross Cavanagh or some other ranger."

"That would be a little too raw, even for this country. They're all feeling gay over this change in the forestry head. But, see here, don't you want to get out for a ride? I've got my new machine out here. It rides like silk."

"I reckon a horse is about my kind," she replied demurely. "If you could take me up to Cavanagh's cabin I'd go," she added. "I want to see him."

"I can take you part way," he hesitantly declared. "But I can't have in my car the last ten miles."

"I don't do it, Joe," she sighed. "These last few days I've been about as headless as an owl. I may the way a fellow feels, but I can't go out doing something to do that has to be done. I'll tell you what, if you want to take me and Lee up to Sulphur I'll go you."

"Sure thing. What day?"

"Not for a day or two. I'm not quite up to it just now, but by Saturday I'll be sufficiently again."

Joe turned joyously to Lee. "That will be great. Won't you come out for a spin this morn'g?"

For a moment Lee was tempted. Anything to get away from this horrible little den and the people who infected it was her feeling, but she trusted Gregg, and she knew that every eye in the town would be upon her if she went, and, besides, Ross might return while she was away. "No; not today," she replied finally, but her voice was gentler than it had ever been to him.

The young fellow was moved to explain his position to Lize. "You don't think much of me, and I don't blame you. I haven't been much use so far, but I'm going to reform. If I had a girl like Lee Virginia to live up to I'd make a great outfit. I don't try to arrest up against Cavanagh. I'm ready to pass that by. And as for this other business, this free range war in which the old man is mixed up—I want you to know that I'm against it. I don't know his day is short, that's what makes him so hot. But he's a bluff, just a fussy old bluff. He knows he has no more right to the government grass than anybody else, but he's going to get ahead of the cattleman if he can."

"Does he know who burned those sheep herders?"

"Of course he knows, but don't go in to say so. You see, that old Basque who was killed was a monopolist too. He went after that grass without asking anybody's leave. More over, he belonged to that Mexican dig-out that everybody hates. The old man isn't crying over that job. It's his money in his pocket. All the same, it's too good a chance to put the books into the cattleman's hands. He's offering a reward, and it looks as if something would really be done this time. They say Neil Ballard was talked up by it and that old guy that showed me the sheep. But I don't take much stock in that. Whoever did it was paid by the cattleman, sure thing." The young fellow's tone and bearing made a favorable impression upon Lize. She had never seen this side of him, for the reason that he had hitherto treated her as a bartender. She was acute enough to understand that her social status had changed along with her release from the cash register, and she was slightly more reconciled, although she could not see her way to providing a living for herself and Lee. For all these reasons she was unwontedly civil to Joe and sent him away highly elated with the success of his interview.

"I'm going to let him take us up to Sulphur," she said to Lee. "I want to go to town."

Lee was silent, but a keen young man through her heart, for she perceived in this remark by her mother a tacit acknowledgment of Ross Cavanagh's desertion of them both. His invitation to them to come and camp with him was only a polite momentary impulse. "I'm ready to go," she announced at last. "I'm tired of this place. Let us go tomorrow."

NEWER METHODS MUST BE USED

In the Handling and Care of Cream for Butter Making.

POOR BUTTER IS NOT MARKETABLE

Buyers Demand Nothing But the Highest Grade.

Farmers Urged to Keep the Cream in Prime Condition Until Placed in Hands of Butter Makers.

expensive. The laboring people could no longer afford to buy butter at 35 to 40 cents per pound. They were compelled to resort to the use of substitutes such as oleomargarine and the like, which was offered at a little more than half the price of butter. The manufacturers of these commodities were not slow to realize the situation and take advantage of it by engaging in a vigorous campaign, advertising their product in the most logical and convincing manner, and forcing upon the market of the entire country vast quantities of the substitutes, until oleomargarine and butterine found its way in to thousands of homes, where such a thing as Oleomargarine had never been thought of. The importation of butter upon the Pacific coast, from abroad, and the importation to the New England states from Canada, have undoubtedly had something to do with present conditions. Thus these different agencies have all tended to reduce the price on butter. We do not wish to convey the idea that the dairy business is doomed, for it is far from it. Dairying has been and will continue to be one of our chief branches of farming, especially in this section of the country. High grade butter still brings a very fair price, while low grades are a drag on the market. In the past two years we have worked for the volume or quantity, from now on we must put our stress and energy upon the quality.

We want cream, to be sure, but we must have good cream and must insist upon having it delivered more frequently and in better condition. No butter maker on earth can make good butter from poor cream. One of two seems inevitable. We must dispense with using poor cream; but if we must use it, let us keep it separate and pay for it what it is worth.

Don't be alarmed as to the future of the dairy business. The present conditions are due to the causes already mentioned. These conditions are only temporary. Things will come out right again. Dairying has been profitable in the past and will so continue, but like all other branches of farming, new, up-to-date methods will have to be employed. It can no longer be carried on in a slipshod manner. Dairying is now a science just as much as any up-to-date farming. We will probably never again be able to market poor butter at a price equal to that of good butter, or nearly so. We must get away from the idea that it is impossible to bring in our cream in a first-class condition.

A great many of our farmers now bring in their cream in prime condition. Why cannot the rest do likewise? It means money in your pockets, friends. If a thing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing right. Let us this year combine our efforts for our mutual good. Give your cows the best of corn and they will fill your can with the nicest kind of cream. Lay special stress on keeping the cream in this condition until you place it in the hands of the butter maker, and your pocket book will grow fatter. We want you to draw from $300 to $1,000 each from cream and milk. The $500 mark has been touched by some the past year, but we want you all to touch the $1,000 mark the coming year.

Yours for quantity and quality,
X. L. PROCTOR COMPANY,
Henry Block.

Zinc to Bind Stones.

In a concrete bridge recently completed near Lyons, France, zinc has been used instead of cement to join the stones of two elliptical arches, the span of which is eighty-two feet. Molten zinc at 800 degrees F. is said to cause no fracture in dry stones, so metallic joints have been formed of one-eighth of an inch thick. The increase in cost is about $2.50 per square foot of the bridge's horizontal surface.

URGES ITS ADOPTION

Superintendent Wright in Favor of the Proposed Amendment.

L. L. Wright, superintendent of public instruction, in an interview in relation to the proposed amendment to the constitution relating to the distribution of primary money says:

"I urge the adoption of the proposed amendment because under the present system of distribution a large number of school districts receive more primary money than they use. The teachers' wages in the state approximate $9,000,000 annually. The amount of primary money distributed annually approximate $6,000,000. There are approximately one thousand districts in the state which now have on hand enough money to pay the teachers' wages and all tuition charges for a period of two years in advance. The census enrollment in these districts approximate 65,000. If this amendment shall be adopted when we come to distribute the primary money we shall not count these 65,000 pupils in making up the apportionment. Heretofore, in making the apportionment we have divided approximately $6,000,000 by approximately 750,000. If this amendment prevails, we shall divide the $6,000,000 by 180,000. This will make the per capita apportionment larger by about eight per cent. No primary money will go to those districts which have on hand enough money to pay their expenses for two years or more until their surplus is reduced to a point sufficient for a two-year supply. They will then again participate. All the money will be distributed to the districts which have not a two-year supply on hand. This will insure the active use and expenditure of all the primary money distributed."

"Miss Clarke is supported by a capable company. Her leading man, Alexander Kearney, in the role of Jacques Cartier, does excellent work as French-Canadian, and his interpretation does much for the piece. Henry Edwards, seen in this city a few weeks ago as Dr. King in the 'Awakening of Helena Richie' was discovered in the role of Bruce Marshall and played it effectively. Miss Diana Dewar played the part of Neamata's sister, Octavia, attractively. On these three persons and Miss Clarke the burden of the plot rested. Miss Clarke with her pen has drawn a consistent story of love and sacrifice with an unusual, natural and beautiful ending in the abnegation of the sister, who has been reared among the luxury of the white folks, by the sister, who has been brought up as a squaw. The rest of the cast includes an Indian brave played by W. E. Korman, his wife, by Miss Mindel Price, and Jeannette, by Miss Bernice Johnson."

PROPER CARE OF ORCHARDS

Written by Frank Smith of Grand Traverse County

MOST SUCCESSFUL GROWER IN REGION

Is an Earnest Advocate of Thorough Spraying

Systematic Spraying Should be Done at Proper Time. Orchard Must be Fertilized
When and How to Spray.

The following article from the Traverse City Record by Frank Smith the well known successful fruit grower of Traverse City will repay careful study:

This is a good time to begin pruning your orchard, and in doing so it is very important that you do not cut off any limbs larger than two inches in diameter. Thin out all the fine twigs, in order to give plenty of free circulation of air through the tree. Air drainage is a necessity to fruit grower, and by careful pruning it can be insured for the entire season. With good air circulation the fruit will be less affected by fungus. Too many make the mistake of leaving too much top to the trees. Less top leaves more strength for the feeders. There is no use feeding a lot of waste wood. The less wood the larger fruit.

All work in spraying waits to be done systematically and at the proper time, or you will not get the best results. How many times should the trees be sprayed? No man can tell you that, for matter who he is. This kind of work depends all on the condition of your orchard, and also the weather. If you have an ideal summer that is warm with lots of sunshine, and not too long, heavy rains, four sprayings will do. If it is such a spring as we had in 1910, cold and wet, the spraying will have to be done often.

If I spray on a certain day and it rains that night, I go over the same trees the next day and spray them again. There is nothing you can spray with that the rain will not reduce amount of poison and spoil its effectiveness, and to be on the safe side it is best to do the work over again. I never take chances on losing a crop of apples. If it is a light rain it will not do any harm.

In spraying you want to be very careful, and be sure that you reach every part of the tree, and even the body of it. Spraying ought to be done if the weather is bad, because very often the dampness causes a fungus that attacks the stem of the blossom, and when it does set it will soon drop off after the next spraying when the blossoms are off. I know this to be a fact from actual experience, and that is the reason why I am such a crank on spraying. The results I have had in the past prove the correctness of my theory. I have sprayed very thoroughly.

In going to the fairs I get in touch with the best growers in the state and they all agree that the thorough spraying done at the proper time is the first step to success for any fruit grower.

Spray before the calyx closes.
That is a very important time to spray, as you want to get the poison in the blow end before it closes and then when the worm hatches and crawls in and begins to feed he is killed by the poison and gets no farther. On the other hand, if the calyx closes and he works his way in and your poison is not there, he simply keeps on going. He may stay in the same apple, or he may come out and spoil more before he stops.

The next spraying is three weeks later, or just before the apples turn down. This spraying is more for fungus, and also prevents the cod-dling moth.

We have what we call the second brood of codling moth. They hatch from the 15th of July to the 1st of August, and you want to spray for them about August 1.
Some years they will ruin your crop of apples, as they are worse some years as they are others, but take no chances and spray at that time as I have learned from actual experience, as they served me that way in 1903, which was before I began spraying systematically. My apples looked fine, and no wormy fruit could be seen until about August 1, and then the worms began their inroads. Since I began spraying I have not been troubled.

There is another work that we must not forget and which must be done to some extent, and that is to fertilize the trees properly. If you have not enough stable manure you should get commercial fertilizer, because you must feed the soil to get the best results. If you have a good dairy cow you must feed her in order to make her useful, and your fruit trees are on the same basis. Feeding your trees gives the feeders strength to feed the trees, and when this is done they will be able to stand the hardships. To show how much I think of fertiliz-ing I will say I will convert about $75 worth of feed on my place during the winter of 1911 which I will put on my 10-acre peach orchard which contains 1,600 trees, five years old this spring, about 10 forks to the tree.

This orchard has been fed every year since it has been set out, with the exception of one year, 1910. You plainly see that it costs money to raise good fruit. You cannot always take off and put nothing back on mother earth and expect to prosper.
That is why so many orchards went up in smoke last year, as they were not in proper condition to stand the strain, not being fertilized and properly sprayed at the right time. We convert every year from eight to nine hundred dollars worth of feed, and most of it goes back in the orchard. This is the product of 25 head of stock.

ROBERT SUPERNOW DEAD

Was Popular Young Man of Norwood Township

Only Nineteen Years Old—Youngest of Large Family.

Although the many friends of Robert Supernow had expected for some time to hear of his death, the news that he had passed away on the evening of March 24 was a great shock to them. Robert had been sick for some time and for several weeks had been confined to his bed where everything possible was done by his relatives and friends to make his last days pleasant. He would have been twenty years old the 3rd of August. A great part of his childhood was spent attending the Norwood school where he first met people who later knew him as a true friend.

A short time ago he joined the Methodist Episcopal church of Norwood being baptized by Rev. J.
G. Biery. He also was a member of Norwood Grange where he found a circle of friends.

He was the youngest of thirteen children. Three brothers and five sisters. The relatives who attended the funeral were: Wm. Super-now and wife, Richard Supernow and wife, Mrs. French, Mrs. Meech, Mrs. Galloway, Mrs. Merrim, Calvin Supernow, Charles Hebbard and wife, Joseph Seymour and wife, Dolphus Supernow, Fred Seymour and wife, Robert and George San-tore.

The funeral was held from the home Monday afternoon at 2:00 o'clock with the burial at the Norwood cemetery, Rev. J. G. Biery officiating.

Many friends gave expression of love and esteem in which they held Robert by sending many beautiful flowers. Six of his young friends acted as pallbearers.

The community wish to extend their sincere sympathy to the family in their bereavement.

THE MUSIC MAKERS

Next Number of Lecture Course Friday Evening, April 7.

Come Highly Recommended. No One Can Afford to Miss This Entertainment.

Clean, manly young fellows, athletically and "musically" to their finger tips, with a "style" and "presence" that immediately captures agent, committeemen and audience alike.
These are the qualities that have made our past tour of "Musicmakers" but little short of a sensation.
With Ralph Dunbar as the pilot, they have been safely guided around the shoals that wreck many new companies. Their program is new and it "moves." No tiresome waiters. When they undertake the classic, they do it so perfectly that even the devotees of popular music enjoy it. If they launch out on one of George Cohan's syncopated effusions, it is performed with such perfect rhythm and balance that the lovers of classical music are not offended, and when they take up the strains of one of "Love's Old Sweet Songs" or one of the old "hymns" it is done with a reverence and a grace that is at once satisfying.

Comedy encores with action are a feature, as are the vocal solos and "stories in verse and song." But it is a Marimbaphone band and when rendering such selections as the "Poet and Peasant" overture, the "American Patrol" or the "Light Cavalry" overture that the work of the company becomes "sensational."
The marimbaphone is new to the lyceum, and, moreover, in its present state the instrument is new to the world, although the principle of producing tones from different length pieces of hard wood is one of the earliest forms of musicmaking and is still in vogue among the tribes of Africa. The modern application of the principle, that of connecting powerful resonators with each key and producing the tones with felt covered hammers, is a wonderful development, the resonators creating the volume and the felt hammers beautifying the quality. The effect might be said to suggest that of a powerful harp.

My Dear Mr. Brockway:

I wish to congratulate you most heartily on your latest "find" the "Musicmakers." They are certainly the "goods." Our Bradford audience came to the hall straight from Missouri, and have to be shown every time, but the boys got them last night all right, all right.

You can well afford to put more stress on the Marimbaphone, as a novelty as well as a legitimate musical instrument. It is in a class by itself as distinctly as are the bells of the Dumbars.

If you care to refer any inquiries about the Musicmakers to me, I shall be glad to speak a good word for them.

OUR CONGRESSMAN

Hon. Francis H. Dadds Has Made a Good Record

Starts Second Term With a Record of Things Accomplished.

In the regular session of congress last year Congressman Dadds' succeeded in having included in the bill and the site bill an authorization of $70,000 for extending the post office at Traverse City $70,000 for a site and building at Big Rapids, and $10,000 for a site at Boyne City. At the last session just closed, by his influence and persis-ent efforts, the general appropribill provided part of the money for these improvements. The bill carried one item of $30,000 to commence the work of enlarging the federal building at Traverse City, and another item of $11,000 for purchasing the site and commencing a federal building at Big Rapids, and $10,000 for a post office site at Boyne City. The location for these buildings in both Big Rapids and Boyne City have already been purchased.

Also, Mr. Dadds has secured magnificent appropriations for the Indian industrial school in this city. Last year he represented to congress that $3,000 was necessary for an office building over there, and a like amount should be provided for an extension to the hospital, in addition to the annual appropriation of $32,800 for the school —and the amounts asked for were allowed. At the last session he presented the need of $2,000 for a boys' lavatory and a same amount for a girls' lavatory and $15,000 for a small boys' dormitory, in addition to the regular appropriation for the year of $32,000—and he got what he wanted this time, too. These additional buildings and improvements will provide room for 30 more pupils at the school.

In addition to these appropriations he got favorable action by congress on 33 private pension bills many more than a congressman usually secures in one session, and he got a bill through congress giving the Indians through this section the privilege of suing in the court of claims for accounts they claim are due them from the government.

The most important act of his first term and the one which brought him into national prominence was his bill to allow official publications of insurance societies, educational institutions, trades unions, etc., to carry general advertising and still be permitted the privileges of the mails at second class rates. He also worked hard on this bill and got it on through the house, but could not succeed in having it reported out of the senate committee. But he declares that the measure is not dead yet, and confidently expects to have it passed at the next session.

Mr. Dadds has been successful, unusually successful, in the number of and amount of the appropriations he has secured for his district. He has the reputation of standing in high estimation among his fellow members, and the things he has accomplished for his constituents will sustain that reputation in the opinion of most of us.
But what is required other than influence to make the showing our congressman has made is work, and we know he keeps everlastingly

LIKES TO FISH

Grand Rapids Herald Writes up Representative Pearson.

And who is this quiet looking man sitting well down to the left of the speaker? Why that is Bill Pearson, representative from Charlevoix county, who says little, thinks much and dreams always of the trout stream and the lake filled with the bass. Bill admits he can't forego the pleasure of fishing. No matter how very pressing the business is or what other interests demand, just let the wind puff the surface of the lake near his home and everything is forgotten. The rod and reel are taken down and away goes Bill to fish.

"I've told my wife a thousand times I'd never close up the store to go fishing again because it isn't business and I do know it. But when the wind just ruffles up the lake, the fever gets me and I can't restrain myself. I just have to go fishing, business or no business."

And so Bill Pearson lives in his merry life, never permitting business to interfere with the pleasure of fishing. And while he is down at laughing listening to the arguments of woman's suffrage and taxation his mind is always on the lake where the fish abound and he sighs continually as he counts the days when the ice will be gone and the law shall say "its time to get out the rod and reel. The fish are bitting."

CHAPTER XVIII.
A CALL FOR HELP.
ON the following morning, while they were busy packing for the journey to Sulphur, Redfield rolled up to the door in company with a young man in the uniform of a forester.

"Go ask Reddy to come in," commanded Lize. "I want to see him."

Redfield met the girl at the door and presented his companion as "Mr. Dalton, district forester." Dalton was a tall young fellow with a marked southern accent. "Is Cavanagh the ranger, in town?" he asked.

"No," Lee replied, with effort; "he was here a few days ago, but he's gone back to the forest."

Redfield studied the girl with keen gaze, perceiving a passionate restraint in her face.

"How is your mother?" he asked politely.

Lee smiled faintly. "She's able to get up. Won't you come in and see her?"

"With pleasure," assented Redfield, "but I want to see you alone. I have something to say to you."

Lee Virginia, hitherto ashamed of the house, the furniture, the bed, everything—led the way with a word of apology. It was all detached now—something about to be left behind like a dead garment borrowed in a time of stress. Nothing mattered since Ross did not return.

Lize, looking unwisely refined and gentle, was sitting in a big rocking chair with her feet on a stool, her eyes fixed on the newcomers, who showed through the open window.

All the morning a sense of profound change of something passing, had oppressed her. Now that she was about to leave the valley its charm appeared better. She was tearing up a small note of this note of whose existence she had hitherto remained unaware.

"I belong here," she acknowledged slowly. "I'd be homeless anywhere else on God's earth. It's rough and dry, but all that, but I belong here."

"You've got a good deal of spirit, being for Redfield, and she's a good person, too. I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you."

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

sheriff, a bearded old man with a small ed collar and a dim eye.

"Gregg growled out, 'You'd better keep your man Cavanagh in the hills. Mr. Forester, or somebody will take a good shot at him.'"

"Why, what's new?"

"His assistant is down with small pox."

"Small pox?" exclaimed Dalton. "Every jaw was fixed and every eye turned upon the speaker."

"Small pox," gasped Lee.

Gregg resumed, enjoying the sensation he was creating. "Yes, that Basque herder of mine, the one up near Black Tooth, sent word he was sick, so I hunted up an old tramp by the name of Edwards to take his place."

Edwards found the dazed dying of Ross and slipped out over the cause, leaving him to die alone. Cavanagh went up and found the dazed dead and took care of him. Result is he's full of germs and has brought his appendage down with it, and both of them must be quarantined right where they are."

"Good heavens, man," exclaimed Dalton, "what's serious business? Are you sure it's small pox?"

"One of my men came from there last night. I was there myself on Monday, so I was the deputy. The sheriff pulled Tom this morning. But I couldn't help him, and Cavanagh added to us that the Basque died of small pox and that he buried him with his own hands."

The sheriff spoke up. "The criminal light of it is this, Mr. Dalton. Cavanagh didn't report the case when he came down here, just when I was looking for a trail of pox. Why didn't he report it?"

"I don't know," said Dalton. "I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you."

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

"I don't know of any other woman in the valley who's so good as you," she repeated, with a smile.

The sheriff insisted. "Tom said it was an old man—a stranger to him—tall, smooth shaven, not very strong, he said, 'peared to be a cook. He had helped nurse the dago, so Tom said.'"

"That's very curious," mused Redfield. "There isn't an old man in the service of this forest. There's a man, take somewhere."

"Well," concluded Gregg, "that's what he said. I thought at first it might be that old hodge-podge fellow, but this fellow being in uniform and smooth shaven." His face changed, his eyes deepened. "Say, I tell you it was Edwards, and furthermore, Edwards is the convict that Texas paroled after the other day, and this man Cavanagh—your prize ranger—is her boring him."

"What nonsense!" exclaimed Redfield.

The sheriff banged his hand upon the table. "That's the whole mystery. I see it all now. He's up there concealing this man. He's given out this small pox scare just to keep the officers away from him. Now you've got it."

The thunder in his voice drove toward him all those who remained in the dining room, and Lee found herself flung about by a dozen excited men, but she did not flinch. She was too deeply concerned over Cavanagh's fate to be afraid, and besides, Redfield and the forester were beside her.

The supervisor was staggered by Gregg's assertion and by certain contradictory facts in his own possession, but he defended Cavanagh bravely.

"Why not?" he asked. "Why should Ross do such a foolish thing? What is his motive? What interest would he have in this man Edwards, whom you call a tramp? He can't be a real tramp and a deputy and a friend of Cavanagh's."

"I don't know what you mean," said Lee. "I don't know what Cavanagh says, but I know what I saw. I saw him, and he was a real tramp, and he was a friend of Cavanagh's."

Gregg was now convinced by this dash of reason, but he said, "I don't know what Cavanagh says, but I know what I saw. I saw him, and he was a real tramp, and he was a friend of Cavanagh's."

Dalton was in a queer mood. "What is the use of arguing? I don't know what Cavanagh says, but I know what I saw. I saw him, and he was a real tramp, and he was a friend of Cavanagh's."

"I don't know what Cavanagh says, but I know what I saw. I saw him, and he was a real tramp, and he was a friend of Cavanagh's."

NEARLY FOUR MILLION

Will be Spent by Pere Marquette Railway This Season

Roadbed will be improved. New locomotives and cars bought.

Just as fast as the men and machines can turn out the work the Pere Marquette Railroad company will expend during the coming season a matter of $3,500,000 in the improvement of the entire system in the state of Michigan. And of this amount the territory in western Michigan centering about Grand Rapids will touch to the extent of more than $1,000,000. Contracts already have been let for much of the work and other work will be begun as soon as the plans can be completed and contracts placed.

Details for the improvements in confirmation of recent announcements made in the press were set forth by W. D. Trump, general superintendent of the Pere Marquette system, in regard to Grand Rapids. Mr. Trump says:

"At Grand Rapids we shall spend between $200,000 and $250,000 this season for improvements. About $100,000 will be invested in improving and increasing general facilities at the Wyoming yards, where we shall double the working capacity of the machine shop. Contracts have been let for this work, which is to be taken up at once and pushed to early completion.

"We shall erect at Wyoming a new engine house with forty-two stalls. The present engine house, which has a twenty-four stall capacity, will be remodeled and have built into it the boiler shop, blacksmith shop and tank shop, which will be removed from the present machine shop. This plan also will double the capacity of the machine shop.

"On the Grand Rapids-Chicago division many large improvements will be made. A new line of track will be run from Alford to Fokker Pier, by which we can go round New Buffalo to the south. The line will be double-tracked between Stevensville and Riverside, a distance of fourteen miles. We also shall cut out the curves and reduce the grades in that distance, so that it will be a complete direct line in every sense. We shall spend about $50,000 on new sidings, or passenger track facilities, between Chicago and Detroit.

"It is our purpose by these improvements, to do away with some of the serious delays incident to the handling of freight between Grand Rapids, Chicago and other points. We are determined to provide much more reliable freight and passenger service for our patrons.

"We have placed orders for six new locomotives, five of which will be of the large Pacific type now running between Grand Rapids and Chicago. The other forty-five engines of a large, heavy type, capable of handling big loads with ease. Of course the track improvements are made in view of this increase in rolling stock.

"Twelve new electric-lighted steel underframe, ventilated passenger cars of the latest type will be purchased besides two more modern mail cars. While the whole road will benefit by these additions to the service, we have specially in mind the needs of the Grand Rapids-Chicago business both freight and passenger. Forty new caboose cars have been ordered for the freight service.

"A good deal of the Detroit-Pontiac division will be relaid with new steel rails heavier than those now in use. The yards at Eastland will be enlarged, by about 850,000 square feet, capacity."

Literary Notes

What the April Woman's Home Companion Contains.

The April number of Woman's Home Companion is brimful, pressed down and overflowing with the spirit of Easter. It is a riot of joyfulness, of truly Easter frolics, of new spring hats, of gardens, music, verse and entertainment. But underneath the sparkle and brightness of the surface attractions of this magazine lies the splendid bedrock of all its helpful departments and strong special articles.

The fiction in the April Woman's Home Companion includes the second part of "The Flight of the Magpie," a charming story of love and adventure and a motor car by C. N. and A. M. Williamson; "Mrs. Benson's Brains" by Anna Warner, a homely little tale of a mother who thought she had very little "brains" but proved the contrary; other contributors are Mary Heaton Vorse, Claude Radium Warren, Grace M. Sisson and Louise Forslund.

An Easter sermon by Dr. Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York City, is one of the features of the April Woman's Home Companion. This number also contains an Easter hymn by Richard LeGallienne, illustrated by Earl Stetson, Crawford and an article on equal suffrage, "Why I Want the Ballot." True was when human seemed to grind a woman's magazine. That time is long past and the "man of the house" will be keenly interested in Mr. John D. Adams' article on "Furniture Making," which includes a design, with working drawings of a comfortable porch swing.

Spring housecleaning and general overhauling will lose its terrors for the young housekeeper if she will read and put into practice the "First Principles" of this important subject, compiled by Mrs. Christine Terhune Herrick. It is possible to enjoy the "comforts of home" even though the awful hour of stock-taking and renovation is at hand, we are told in the April Woman's Home Companion. Little gardens and gardens, flower and vegetable gardens—they all have a corner in this splendid Easter number.

Four clean, manly, audacious, musical fellows, carrying the large, ornate piano on the road will make music at the Charlevoix theatre, Friday evening, April 7, 1911.

THEATRICAL

The senior play pleased a fair sized audience at the Charlevoix theatre, Wednesday night. All the characters were well handled. Not the least pleasing feature was the music by the high school orchestra.

Among books "The House of a Thousand Candles" is looked upon as the best seller. Among plays "The House of a Thousand Candles" is undoubtedly one of the best drawing cards the stage has ever known. On its presentation at the Charlevoix theatre on Monday evening, April 3, its mysterious rooms and old surroundings will be mounted in a most elaborate manner as the complete production is carried. The company has been most carefully selected so that all the unusual characters that add so much to the charm of both book and play will be most artistically drawn.

The weird happenings, the strange characters, the spiritual sciences so vividly described in that successful novel "The House of a Thousand Candles" are even more bewildering in the dramatization that has created a furor in theatrical circles. On its production at the Charlevoix theatre on Monday evening the play will be elaborately staged and excellently enacted. The House of a Thousand Candles is one of the few attractions that has scored an immediate success. This is due to the novelty of its not fit to ride a mile. I won't hear of your going."

"You wait and see. I'm going, and you can't stop me." "Who is the man with him?" asked the forester.

"I don't know—an old herder, he said. He said he could take care of him all right for the present, but that if he were taken down himself."

Lee's mounting emotion broke from her in a little cry. "Oh, Mr. Redfield, please let me go now. I want to help!"

Redfield said: "I'll telephone to St. Paul City and ask Brooks to get a nurse and come down as soon as possible. Meanwhile I'll go out to see what the conditions are."

"I'm going, too, I tell you," announced Lee. "I've had the endless disease, and I'm not afraid of it. We had three sleighs of it in my family. You get me up there, and I'll do the rest."

"But you are ill."

"I was, but I'm not now." Her voice was firmer than it had been for days. "All I needed was something to do. Ross Cavanagh has been like a son to me for two years. He's the one man in this country I'd turn my hand over for—harrying himself, Reddy—and it's my job to see him through this pinch."

In spite of all opposition she had her way. Returning to her room to get such clothing as she needed for her stay in the hills, she waited for Redfield to send a carriage to her. "I can't ride a horse no more," she sorrowfully admitted.

Lee's secret was no secret to any one there. Her white eyes and heaving breast testified to the profound grief in her heart. She was in an anguish of fear lest Ross should already be in the grip of his hereditary enemy. That it had come to him by way of a leave and tattle she made the situation only the more tragic.

CHAPTER XIX THE TESTIMONY

Cavanagh had kept it keen watch over Wetherford, and when one night the old man began to complain of the ache in his bones his doctor was in attendance.

"You're gettin' it," he said. "It's up to us to move down the valley tomorrow."

Wetherford replied that he would as such one of the old men in the valley. "I'll stay with you, Vagabond, but if I see you liable to take out I'll have to go to bed. I don't want to forget her and then I come back to find out how she was. I like to be a nuisance to you, and so I'll go down the valley if you say so."

As he was about to turn in that night Ross heard a horse cross the bridge and, with intent to warn the rider of his danger, went to the door and called out: "Halt! Who's there?"

"A friend," replied the stranger in a weak voice.

Ross permitted the visitor to ride up to the porch. "I can't ask you in," he explained. "I've a sick man inside. Who are you, and what can I do for you?"

Notwithstanding this warning the rider dropped from his saddle and came into the light which streamed from the door.

"My name is Dunn," he began. "I'm from Deer Creek."

"I know you," responded the ranger. "You're that rancher I saw working in the ditch the day I went to telephone, and you've come to tell me something about that murder."

The other man broke into a white per. "I'm a law-abiding man, Mr. Cavanagh," he began tremulously. "I've always kept the law and never intended to have anything to do with that business. I was dragged into it against my will. I've come to you because you're an officer of the federal law. You don't belong here. I trust you. You represent the president, and I want to tell you what I know, only I want you to promise not to bring me into it. I'm a man with a family, and I can't bear to have them know the truth."

There were deep agitation and complete sincerity in the rancher's choked and hesitant utterance, and Cavanagh turned cold with a premonition of what he was about to disclose. "I am not an officer of the law, Mr. Dunn, not in the sense you mean, but I will respect your wishes."

"I know that you are not an officer of the county law, but you're not a cattleman. It is your business to keep the peace in the wild country, and you do it. Everybody knows that. But I can't trust the officers of this country; they're all afraid of the cowboys. You are not afraid, and you represent the United States, and I'll tell you. I can't bear it any longer," he wailed. "I must tell somebody. I can't sleep, and I can't eat. I've been like a man in a nightmare ever since. I had no hand in the killing—I didn't even see it done—but I know it was going to happen. I saw the committee appointed. The meeting that decided it was held in my barn, but I didn't know what they intended to do. You believe me, don't you?" He peered at Cavanagh with white face and wild eyes. "I'm over seventy years of age, Mr. Cavanagh, and I've been a law-abiding citizen all my life."

His mind, shattered by the weight of his ghastly secret, was in confusion, and, perceiving this, Cavanagh began to question him gently. One by one he prompted the names of those who voted to "shoot with" the herders. One by one he obtained also the list of those named on "the committee of reried," and as the broken man delivered himself of these accusing facts he grew calmer. "I didn't know—I couldn't believe that the men on that committee could chop and burn!" His utterance faltered again, and he fell silent abruptly.

"They must have been drunk—mad drunk," retorted Cavanagh. "And yet who would believe that even drink could inflame white men to such devil's work? When did you first know what had been done?"

"That night after it was done one of the men, my neighbor, who was drawn on the committee, came to my house and asked me to give him a hand. He was afraid to go home. 'I can't face my wife and children,' he said. He told me what had been done, and then when I remembered that it had all been decided in my stable and the committee appointed there I began to tremble. You believe I'm telling the truth, don't you?" he again asked, with piteous accent.

"Yes, I believe you. You must tell this story to the judge. It will end the reign of the cattleman."

"Oh, no! I can't do that."

"You must do that. It is your duty as a Christian man and citizen."

"No, no! I'll stay and help you—I'll do anything but that. I'm afraid to tell what I know. They would harm me, they would. I'm not a western man. I've never been in a criminal court. I don't belong to this wild country. I oughtn't to be here. My daughter is not strong, and poor!" He broke down again, and leaning against his horse sobbed pitifully.

Cavanagh, convinced that the old man's mind was too weakly affected to enable him to tell his story, spoke to him once more. "I'll get you some coffee to drink," he said. "Sit down here and rest and we'll talk some more." Wetherford looked at him with the same anxious expression. "What's out there?" he asked. "Is it the murderer?"

"No, it's one of the ranchers from Deer Creek. He's died and left me, and I'm going to tell him. Ross replied, filled with a vivid sense of the diverse characters of the two men he was serving.

Dunn received the coffee with an eager hand, and after he had finished his refreshment Cavanagh continued: "The whole country should be obliged to you for your visit to me. I shall send your information to Supervisor Redfield."

"Don't use my name," he begged. "They will kill me if they find out that I have told. We were all sworn to secrecy, and if I had not seen that fire, that pile of bodies!"

"I know, I know! It horrified me. It made me doubt humanity," responded Cavanagh. "We of the north cry out against the south for its lynchings, but here under our eyes goes on an equally horrible display of rage over the mere question of temporary advantage, over the appropriation of free grass, which is a federal resource—something which belongs neither to one claimant nor to the other, but to the people, and should be of value to the people. You must bring these men to punishment."

Dunn could only shiver in his horror and repeat his fear. "They'll kill me if I do."

Cavanagh at last said: "You must not attempt to ride back tonight. I can't give you lodging in the cabin because my patient is sick of smallpox, but you can camp in the barn till morning, then ride straight back to your friend Redfield and tell him what you've told me. He will see that you are protected. Make your deposition and leave the country if you are afraid to remain."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

GOOD AND EVIL

The best gifts, those that we should covet above all others if we understood their value, are those which may or may not chance to come to us, but those which must inevitably follow us when we are good and true, faithful and wise. The worst calamities are not those which may come upon us unawares, but those which follow from conscious wrongdoing.

ALFALFA

By Melton M. Burnham.

The history of alfalfa as a pasture and forage plant, if it could be correctly written, would doubtless cover a much longer period than any tolerably authentic history of the human family. It is supposed to have been indigenous to the trackless and rainless steppes of Asia, and to have been familiar to the most ancient tribesmen who inhabited the central-southern portion of that continent. It furnished the food for the horses of the vast armies of those ancient warriors whose names have come down to us in legends and songs, and whose deeds were dim long before the beginning of our era.

It lived and sustained thousands, perhaps millions, of domestic animals throughout the long history of the Holy Roman Empire, though all the vicissitudes of Egypt it stood erect, uninjured by tropical suns and blossomed as a rose in the midst of driftwood sands, though trampled by the armies of southern Europe, and the invulnerable hordes of Mahomet repeatedly crossing and recrossing the whole of northern Africa.

It crossed the Mediterranean and enriched the soil of Italy. From Italy and Egypt it was transported into Spain, from which her hardy and adventurous sons, then valiant and great, introduced it to all the then civilized and partly civilized and partly civilized nations of the world. It was highly prized in all civilized South America centuries ago, also in many parts of Europe, particularly Germany, Austria and Hungary.

It seems to have been introduced into this country, both from the east and west, in a very early date in the beginning of our agriculture. However, its general and extensive cultivation has been long delayed in most of our states, even in sections best suited to its very profitable production.

Among the causes that have contributed to its neglect, I think, we may name: 1. The fact that our virgin soil was at first very fertile and was supposed to need no renewal or fertilization. 2. That it does not except an irrigated land, where it may be readily killed by a 48-hour continuous bath in shallow water, and the ground to a rotation of crops. 3. That it demands soil free from grass, weeds and other plants of which to grow, and that the soil where it is sown shall be in fine tilth and sufficiently supplied with soil moisture. 4. That the soil where it must be already sufficiently supplied with the bacteria absolutely necessary to its life or else such bacteria must be artificially supplied by their husbandman. 5. Any other reason which it is likely to prove fatal to it.

These facts together with the unrecognized superior comparative value of the plant have served no doubt to delay the general recognition of the merits of alfalfa. It is now coming rapidly to be somewhat appreciated as one of the most valuable foods known, not only for domestic animals, but for mankind also, in case of a lack of cereal products now usually consumed. Although long grown in South America, yet its constituent chemical properties were unrecognized and utilized there, and for many decades the Argentines, etc., were sending bean heaves to the European markets in hopeless competition with the corn-fed heaves of the United States of America. But that is all over now; having heard of "balanced rations," and of the chemical and food values of alfalfa the farmers there have learned to fatten their herds on alfalfa, both green and dry, till the ox of the pampas outshines the steer of the prairies and is making our western Yankees look up and take notice.

We are told that the food supply largely determines the trend and quality of progress and civilization and as alfalfa is surely destined to largely and appreciably affect the food supply of the nations, its importance looms high on the horizon of man's future on the earth.—Melton M. Burnham.

Swelled the Collection.

A Peaches minister got a conferee to preach for him, and, meeting this conferee the next month, he said:

"Man, I'll have to get ye to preach again at my kirk. We never had such a big collection as we had the Sunday you preached for us."

"Well, now, I'm glad to hear that," said the other in a gratified tone. "How much was the collection, if I may ask?"

"Ninety-nine," was the reply, "and usually it's only twopenny. It's never been over threepenny yet."

"Well," said the other minister, "they can't think much of my eloquence, after all, then, for I put in six pence myself."

MISSOURI HELPS CLOTHE PEERS FOR CORONATION.

Furnishes Weasel Skins to Deck English Aristocracy.

Minkes are not the only useful article that the state of Missouri furnishes to the British empire. Weasel skins also go from "show me" land to London.

In a big St. Louis fur house a score of men have been busy sixteen hours a day at sorting thousands of weasel pelts, which arrive in an endless succession of mail and express packages. It is a long way from this scene to the gorgeous historical pageant of the coronation of King George V. Yet the weasel skins which the St. Louis workmen stack in neat piles are destined, under the aristocratic name of ermine, to ornament the robes of peers and peeresses and perhaps the state garments of the king and queen themselves.

For St. Louis, "the fur capital of the world," is supplying most of the ermine which the lords and ladies of the English realm will wear at the crowning of their sovereign. One St. Louis firm sent 6,000 ermine pelts to London last month and has 6,000 more which are being held for an expected rise in price. Jan. 25 an auction house in London sold 70,000 ermine skins, most of which were collected by St. Louis dealers.

The little animals from which the ermine skins were stripped are the same in species as the marauding brown weasels which farmers boys in Missouri and Arkansas catch in traps in their hutches. But in Canada and such northern states as Minnesota and Vermont, nature, to protect the weasel, turns its coat white in winter to match the snow.

Four months ago, when the northern snows fell, they turned pure white, except that the tip of the tail became a glossy black. The change in color wrought a miracle. When brown the pelts are worth about 2 cents each and are considered fit only to cover the animals for chaff. But on becoming white the fur is metamorphosed into ermine, to which for centuries the adjectives "royal" and "precious" have been applied and which in Australia all are forbidden by law to save those of the emperor's blood. One ermine skin before being manufactured may be worth from $1 to $5.

For each robe from 500 to 1,000 pelts will be needed. What the king's coronation robe will require may be judged from that of Czar Nicholas of Russia, which was made of 250,000 skins.

SONGS BY WIRELESS.

Experiment in Telephoning Made by Harvard Students.

Members of the Harvard Wireless club are winning success in their experiments with wireless telephoning.

Conversations, songs and instrumental music on the graphophone have been flashed from the Harvard college station in Jefferson hall to the stations of the members, where it was said to be reproduced with absolute clearness. By using electric current of high frequency alternation in connection with wireless telephony distances up to forty miles have been negotiated successfully.

As for long distance telegraph records, the members of the society feel that they have no reason to complain. R. B. Wolverton, the manager of the club, has picked up messages from Milwaukee, Chicago and Tampa, Fla. Occasionally he is able to hear messages from Key West.

STATE TEACHER'S INSTITUTE.

A teacher's institute has been appointed for Charlevoix county same to be held in the city of Charlevoix on Friday and Saturday, April 7 and 8, 1911.

Prof. R. D. Calkins of Mt. Pleasant has been appointed as instructor and he will have charge of the meeting.

Prof. Calkins is a specialist in the line of geography and will give a course of lectures on this subject that no teacher in the county can afford to miss.

This meeting was appointed by the department for an earlier date but owing to the prevailing health conditions of the county at that time it was thought unwise to hold same.

We realize that the date as set is a little late but hope that it will serve to brighten the pathway of the teacher whose pupils yawn and look towards the front streams during the warm weather of the closing months of the term.

Full program will be mailed to teachers this week.

Teachers will be expected to close their schools on Friday and will receive a certificate of attendance which will entitle them to pay for day.

It may require an effort on the part of some of the teachers of the county to reach Charlevoix but the meeting will be worth the effort.

Take due notice thereof and meet with us at Charlevoix on April 7-8. J. H. Millard, Com.

Judge Mayne has 275 majority in the city and an enormous majority in every county in the circuit.

In the state the chief interest was in the fight between the wet and dry forces in eighteen counties, the election of the Republican state ticket being conceded, the wets had the best of the fight, gaining back the large counties of Calhoun, Genesee and Jackson while the drys gained only two wet counties, Montcalm and Iosco, with Montmorancy claimed by both sides.

The following counties voted dry: Allegan, Benzie, Clare, Emmet, Ionia, Iosco, Montcalm, Newaygo, Sanilac and Tuscola. The wet counties are Alpena, Calhoun, Cheboygan, Genesee, Huron, Jackson, Kalamazoo.

CHILD BADLY BURNED

While Playing Around a Bonfire in Boyne City.

A very bad accident occurred in North Boyne Tuesday night in which a little girl was burned seriously. The child, Nellie Bissell of Mr. N. O. Bissell was at play in the yard of a neighbor Mr. Arnold, with some other children and Mr. Arnold had been boiling some potatoes for his pigs in a large kettle, building a fire in the yard for the purpose. The fire had gone down, when the children began playing with it by piling on tar paper and putting on kerosene oil, jumping and playing about until in some way the flames caught in the clothing of the little girl. Screaming and terrified she rushed to the house of Mr. Arnold where the flames were extinguished by men, but she was terribly burned.

Medical assistance was at once secured and everything possible was done to alleviate the pain but the burns about the face are so deep that the little one will probably be disfigured for life. She was also badly burned about the hips and lower limbs.—Boyne City Journal.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Dollars Loss in a Big Fire at City of Petoskey

Early Tuesday Morning—Most Serious Fire in City's History.

Petoskey has had many fires of more or less serious nature, but perhaps none that have struck closer to the business heart of the city or which have resulted more disastrously to the most intimately concerned losers, than the one Tuesday morning.

The alarm was turned in at about one forty-five, but at that time the flames had gained such headway in the rear end of the J. J. Hankey three-story building occupied by G. Dale Gardner, that by the time the fire department reached the scene there was practically little hope of saving anything for it was one of the most stubborn fires that the department has ever had to contend with.

Hose company No. 1 responded with astonishing alacrity, but it was quickly evident that it was not able to cope with the situation, and a general alarm was turned in, and No. 2 was on the ground as quickly as horseflesh could bring them, and yet many trips were made to the hose houses, for additional lines with which to get a greater volume of water. On the fierce blaze, and it proved all too soon how utterly inadequate the city is equipped for a fire of the dimensions of this one, though every foot of hose the city possessed was forced into service.

In an incredibly short time it was evident that not a stick could be saved of the contents of the Gardner store, and the firemen and spectators had to stand by and see the valuable stock totally destroyed, as well as all of Dr. Ramsdell's office furniture, books, records and everything valuable.

The building east of the Gardner store, occupied by Beese & Porter was on fire several times but heroic work prevented a great damage except possibly to the walls, though a good deal of the stock, consisting mostly of ladies suits was badly damaged by the smoke, but all was removed to the other room of the store.

The living room above, occupied by Andrew Lindell and wife, and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas were not seriously damaged, but Mrs. Thomas who was sick had to be moved to safer quarters wrapped in the bedding on which she lay.

Most insistent efforts were put forth to keep the fire confined to the Gardner rooms, but the mass of inflammable material on the inside

CHANGES ARE MANY IN BILL

To Amend the Primary Election Law of the State

PREPARED BY ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Twenty-five Sections are Changed by Radical Amendments

Twenty per cent Vote Necessary to Get Party Ticket on Official Ballot—New Dates are Set for Primaries.

Last week the new primary bill was introduced.

The proposed changes had been prepared by the attorney-general. It is recommended that the general election law be made applicable to meetings of board of canvassers when notices of primary elections are given. The bills change the general primary day from early in September to the last Monday in August so it won't be too close to Labor day. The primary for city, county and district officers shall be held the first Monday in March, but in cities where the charter election is not held at the November or the biennial spring election shall be held on the third Tuesday prior to the charter election.

General enrollment is provided for the first Monday in April, preceding the August primary day, and also for the last Saturday in January of each year. A general enrollment is required and all the old acts covering enrollments are repealed. Under the old laws the enrollment board is required to enroll as an "independent" any person who refused or neglected to state his political affiliation. An amendment is proposed providing that if the elector neglects or refuses to disclose the name of his party he shall not be registered. An elector, though, may be enrolled with any political party which he may name.

The new bills provide for the following additional changes: The law shall apply to the cities of less than 50,000 where the recommendations for direct nominations have been approved. The plan of direct nominations may be submitted or re-submitted in any city of less than 50,000 on any primary day.

The primary law is made compulsory in every county and judicial district.

PROPER CARE OF ORCHARDS

Written by Frank Smith of Grand Traverse County

MOST SUCCESSFUL GROWER IN REGION

Is an Earnest Advocate of Thorough Spraying

Systematic Spraying Should be Done at Proper Time—Orchards Must be Fertilized—When and How to Spray.

(Continued from last week.) In regard to those orchards that suffered last year, we know that the foliage is the life of a tree and when that is affected the tree is out of condition.

Whether such trees will produce vigorous fruit buds is a question. If I had an orchard in that condition the first thing I would do would be to thin it good, fertilize it and keep cultivated all summer, and if it had made fruit, buds, and the spring and summer, in its favor, it may hold its crop.

I look for good prices this coming summer on all kinds of fruit, and what we want to do is to grow our fruit right, pack it right and the price will be right.

If trees are kept in proper condition such as Dunes, Hubbardtown, Wealthy, Gamet, Wagner and Yellow Transparents ought to bear one bushel each at five years old. Cherries ought to bear one 16 quart crate at five years old. Peach trees should bear 2 1/2 bu. at five years.

I have a peach orchard that when eight years old I expect will bear live bushels to the tree, and expect a blueberry orchard will bring me in $5,000 and that is only figuring them at $1.00 per bushel, when many will bring $2.

I sent a number of six-basket crates holding just a few over a bushel, to Chicago, and they sold for two dollars a crate. This orchard will all depend on me for its sale. If it will do as well in the future as it has in the past three years hence it will easily net me the $5,000.

It will all depend, however, on the man behind the trees, and it will have to get all that is coming to it in care. That means proper breeding, spraying, pruning, picking and packing. This has been done before and can be done again. A peach orchard requires constant cultivation.

In using Bordeaux mixture on peaches, apples, cherries and plums use 3 pounds blue vitrol, 3 pounds lime, 1/2 pound paris green, or 2 pounds arsenate of lead in place of paris green to 5 gallons of water. After the foliage comes out, and before the buds open, use 4 pounds blue vitrol, and no lime or paris green. In using lime or sulphur before buds open use 1 gallon of lime and sulphur to 12 gallons of water. After the buds open use 1 gallon of lime and sulphur to 35 gallons of water, or 2 pounds of arsenate of lead to 50 gallons of water, and keep well agitated. Either mixture properly put on will give you good results.

In using the Bordeaux mixture in wet seasons it may wash the apples some. The blue vitrol is some cheaper than lime and sulphur.

In using the blue vitrol, take 25 pounds of it and put it in a barrel with 30 gallons of water, allow the vitrol to be about half in the water, and it will dissolve in about 30 to 40 minutes; then take three gallons of this solution to 50 gallons of water—it comes harder than to dissolve a little at a time.

When you get the same results you will praise spraying as I do. It was simply marvelous to grow such a marvelous crop of apples as I did in 1910, and hold the foliage throughout the season, as I never got a better growth on my trees than last year.

A few more pointers I would like to give fruit growers:

You want to be on your guard all the time, and keep a close watch on your apple crop. After the fruit begins to set, examine them every

ALFALFA

By Milton M. Burdick.

Botanically it is known as Medicago Sativa, order Leguminosae (and bearing or nitrogen gathering plant).

It is an upright branching perennial, growing from one to four feet high and of a very dark green color. The leaves are long and narrow in shape and will be found growing in clusters of three all along the smaller branches. The flowers are purple and pea-like and grow in long, loose clusters of racemes. The ripe seed pod are twisted spherically into two or three complete circles, and each pod contains several seeds about one-twelfth of an inch in length and about one-twenty-fourth of an inch in diameter.

Found growing surrounded by other grasses, it will be seen to be much more conspicuous than any of the others owing to its being considerably taller and, when in blossom, much more beautiful.

Instead of reaching the culmination of its life and the period of death at the end of two years, like alfalfa and ordinary clover, it is from four to five years or longer in reaching its best or even its full state of productivity and its perfect or maximum state of productiveness may be indefinitely extended with proper cultivation.

Feed as pasture it will renew itself without reseedling for any length of time if wisely cared for. Of course, like any other plant, it can be exterminated.

THIS IS CERTAIN
The Proof That Charlevoix Readers Cannot Deny.

What could furnish stronger evidence of the efficiency of any remedy than the test of time. Thousands of people testify that Doan's Kidney Pills cure permanently.

Grateful endorsements should prove undoubtedly the merits of this remedy. Years ago people in this vicinity testified to the relief they had derived from the use of Doan's Kidney Pills. They now confirm their testimonials. They say that time has completed the test.

W. E. VanCamp, H. E. St. Cheboygan, Mich., says: "I was subject to severe pains in my back and I caught cold. I suffered more intensely. When Doan's Kidney Pills were brought to my attention, I obtained a supply and it did not take long to cure me. I am pleased to give this remedy the praise it deserves. A statement given August 21, 1908."

GOOD REASON FOR RE-ENDORSEMENT.
On August 3, 1908, Mr. VanCamp said: "The public statement I gave in praise of Doan's Kidney Pills some years ago still holds good. My cure has been permanent."

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND
Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

In the end the rancher promised to do this, but his tone was that of a broken and distraught detainee. All the landmarks of his life seemed suddenly shifted.

Meanwhile the sufferings of Wetherford were increasing, and Cavanagh was forced to give up all hope of getting him down the trail next morning, and when Swenson, the forest guard from the South Fork, knocked at the door to say that he had been to the valley and that the doctor was coming up with Redfield and the district forester Ross thanked him, but ordered him to go into camp across the river and to warn everybody to keep clear of the cabin. "Put your packages down outside the door," he added, "and take charge of the situation on the outside. I'll take care of the business inside."

Wetherford was in great pain, but the poison of the disease had misted his brain, and he no longer worried over the possible disclosure of his identity. At times he lost the sense of his surroundings and talked of his prison life or of the long ride northward. Once he rose in his bed to beat off the waves which he said were attacking his body.

He was a piteous figure as he sat, glared thus, and he needed neither his relationship to Lee nor his bravery in caring for the Basque herder to fill the ranger's heart with a desire to relieve his suffering. "Perhaps I should have sent for Lee at once," he mused as the light brought out the red signs of the plague.

Once the old man looked up with wide, dark, unseeing eyes and murmured, "I don't seem to know you."

"I'm a friend. My name is Cavanagh."

"I can't place you," he sadly admitted. "I feel pretty bad. If I ever get out of this place I'm going back to the Fork. I'll get a gold mine, then I'll go back and make up for what Lee has gone through. I'm afraid to go back now."

"All right," Ross soothingly agreed. "But you'll have to keep quiet till you get over this fever you're suffering from."

"If Lee weren't so far away she'd come and nurse me. I'm pretty sick," Swenson came back to say that probably Redfield and the doctor would reach the station by noon, and thereafter, for the reason that Cavanagh expected their coming, the hours dragged wearily. It was after 1 o'clock before Swenson announced that two men and two women in their party were in half an hour.

The ranger's heart leaped. Two women! Could one of them be Lee Virginia? What folly—what sweet, desperate folly! And the other—she could not be Lee, for Lee was too feeble to ride so far. "Stop them on the other side of the bridge," he commanded. "Don't let them cross the creek on any pretext."

As he stood in the door the flutter of a handkerchief, the waving of a hand, made his pulse glow and his eyes grew dim. It was Virginia!

Lee did not flutter a handkerchief or wave a hand, but when Swenson stopped the carriage at the high place she said, "No, you don't. I'm going across. I'm going to see Ross, and if he needs help I'm going to roll up my sleeves and take hold."

Cavanagh saw her advancing, and as she came near enough for his voice to reach her he called out: "Don't come any closer! Stop! I tell you! His voice was stern. "You must not come a step nearer. Go back across the dead line and stay there. No one but the doctor shall enter this door. Now, that's final."

"I want to help," she protested. "I know you do, but I won't have it. This quarantine is real, and it goes."

"But suppose you yourself get sick?" "Well, cross that bridge when we get to it. I'm all right so far, and I'll call for help when I need it."

His tone was imperative, and she obeyed, grumbling about his youth and the value of his life to the service.

"That's all very nice," he replied, "but I'm in it, and I don't intend to expose you or any one else to the contagion."

"Pre-had it once," she asserted. "He looked at her and smiled in recognition of her subterfuge.

"No matter; you're ailing and might take it again," so "toddle back." "It's mighty good of you and of Lee to come, but there isn't a thing you can do, and here's the doctor," he added as he recognized the young student who passed for a physician in the Fork. He was a headless youth of small experience and no great courage, and as he approached with hesitant feet he asked:

"Are you sure it's smallpox?" "Cavanagh smiled. "The indications are all that way. That last importation of Binsques brought it probably from the steamer of the ship. I'm told they've had several cases over in the basin."

"Have you been vaccinated?" "Yes, when I was in the army."

"Then you're all right."

"I hope so."

There was a certain comic relief in this long distance diagnosing of a "case" by a boy, and yet the tragic fact beneath it all was that Wetherford was dying, a broken and dishonored husband and father, and that his identity must be concealed from his wife and daughter, who were much more deeply concerned over the ranger than over the desperate condition of his patient.

"And this must continue to be so," Cavanagh decided. And as he stood there looking toward the girl's fair figure on the ledge, he came to the final, fixed determination never to speak one word or make a sign that might lead to the dying man's identification. "Of what use is it?" he asked himself. "Why should poor Lee be made to suffer? Wetherford's poor, bespoken life is already over for her, and for Lee he is only a dim memory."

Redfield came near enough to see that the ranger's face, though tired, showed no sign of illness and was relieved. "Who is this old herder?" he asked. "Hasn't he any relatives in the country?"

"He came from Texas, so he said. You're not coming in?" he broke off to say to the young physician, whom Lee had shamed into returning to the cabin.

"I suppose I'll have to," he protested weakly.

"I don't see the need of it. The whole place reeks of the poison, and you might carry it away with you. Unless you insist on coming in and are sure you can prevent further contagion I shall oppose your entrance. You're in the company of others. I must consider their welfare."

The young fellow was relieved. "Well, so long as we know what it is I can prescribe just as well right here," he said and gave directions for the treatment, which the ranger agreed to carry out.

"I tried to bring a nurse," explained Redfield, "but I couldn't find anybody but old Lee who would come."

"I don't blame them," replied Ross. "It isn't a nice job, even when you've got all the conveniences."

His eyes as he spoke were on the figure of Lee, who still stood on the bridge, awed and worshipful, barred of approach by Lee. "She shall not know," he silently vowed. "Why put her through useless suffering and shame? Edward Wetherford's disorderly life is near its end. To betray him to his wife and daughter would be but a foolishness of an old woman."

He was silent in the center of his heart by the coming of Lee Virginia, so sweet and brave and trustful. His stern mood melted as he watched her there waiting, with her face turned toward him, longing to help. "She would have come alone if necessary," he declared, with a fuller revelation of the self-sacrificing depth of her love, "and she would come to my side this moment if I called her."

He went back to his repulsive, very low sustained and stilled by the little camp of faithful friends on the other side of the stream.

During one of his clearest moments Wetherford repeated his wish to die a stranger. "I'm going out like the old time west, a rag of what I once was. Don't let them know. Put no name over me. Just say, 'An old cowpuncher or his horse.'"

Cavanagh's attempt to change his hopeless fate proved unavailing. He fed by his friendships and his pain on life, he had little reserve force upon which to draw in dealing such an enemy. He sank soon after this into speech into a coma which continued to hold him in its iron grasp as night fell.

Meanwhile, seeing no chance of aiding the ranger, Redfield and the forester proposed to return, but Lee, enforced by her mother, refused to accompany them. "I shall stay here," she said, "till he is safely out of it. I'll know that he is beyond all danger."

Redfield did not urge her to return as vigorously as Dutton expected him to do, but when he understood the girl's desire to be near her lover he took off his hat and bowed to her. "You are entirely in the right," he said. "Here is where you belong."

Redfield honored Lee for her sympathetic support of her daughter's resolution and expressed his belief that Ross would escape the plague. "I feel that his splendid vigor, combined with the mountain air, will carry him through, even if he should prove not to be immune. I shall run up again day after tomorrow. I shall be very anxious. What a nuisance that the telephone line is not extended to this point. Ross has been hesitating on its value for months."

Lee saw the doctor go with some dismay. Young as he was, he was at least a real to cling to in case the grisly terror seized upon the ranger. "Mrs. Redfield, can't you send a real doctor? It sounds so horrible to be left here without instructions."

The forester, before going, again besought Cavanagh not to abandon his work in the forestry service and intimated that at the proper time advancement would be offered him. "The whole policy is but beginning," said he, "and a practical ranger with your experience and education will prove of greatest value."

To this Lee made reply: "At the moment I feel that the promise of advancement could keep me in this country of grifters, penurers and assassins. I'm weary of it and all it stands for. However, if I could aid in extending the supervision of the public ranges and in stopping forever this murder and burning that go on outside the forestry domain I might remain in the west."

"Would you accept the supervision of the Washable Forest?" demanded Dutton.

Taken by surprise, he stammered, "I might, but am I the man?"

"You are. Your experience fits you for a position where the fight is hot. The Washable forest is even more a bone of contention than this. We have laid out the lines of division between the sheep and the cows, and it will take a man to enforce any regulations. You will have the support of the best citizens. They will all rally, with you as leader, and so end the warfare there."

"It can never end till Uncle Sam puts rangers over every section of public lands and lays out the grazing lines as we have done in this forest," retorted Cavanagh.

"I know, but to get that requires a revolution in the whole order of things." Then his fine young face lighted up. "But we'd get it. Public sentiment is coming over. The old order is already so rotten away that only its shell remains."

"It may be. If these assassins are punished I shall feel hopeful of the change."

"I shall recommend you for the supervision of the Washable forest," concluded Dutton decisively. "And so goodbye and good luck."

England, his blood relatives, even the Redfields, seemed very remote to the ranger as he stood in his door that night and watched the sparkle of Swenson's campfire through the trees. With the realization that there waited a brave girl of the type that loves single heartedly, ready to sacrifice everything to the welfare of her idealized subject, he felt unworthy, selfish, vain.

"If I should fall sick she would insist on nursing me. For her sake I must give Swenson the most rigid orders not to allow her, no matter what happens, to approach. I will not have her touched by this thing."

Beside the blaze Lee and her mother sat for the most part in silence, with nothing to do but to wait the issue of the struggle going on in the cabin, so near and yet so inaccessible to their will. It was as if a magic wall, crystal clear, yet impenetrable, stood there, away from the man whose quiet heroism was the subject of their constant thought.

It was marvellous, as the dusk fell and the air slipped keen, to see how Lee Wetherford retained her youth. The old woman seemed to have taken a fresh hold on life. She was weary, but by no means worn out, by her ride and the heartily of the ride fare which Swenson set before her. "This is what I needed," she exultantly said, "the open air and the front. I feel ten years younger already. May's the night I've camped on the range with your father with nothing but a pup tent to cover us both and the wolves howling round us. I'd feel pretty badly if it wasn't for Ross over there in that cabin playing nurse and cooking all by his lonesomeness."

Lee expressed a deep satisfaction from the fact of their progress. "If he's all right, a help hand," she reiterated.

There was a touch of frost in the air as they went to their beds, and though she shivered, Lee was undisturbed. "There's nothing the matter with my heart," she declared. "I don't believe there was anything really serious the matter with me, anyway. I reckon I was just naturally grouchy and worried over you and Ross."

CHAPTER XX.
WITH THE aid of the press.

LEE VIRGINIA was now living a romantic stranger and more star than ever. In her opinion she was able to look back and down upon the Fork as if she had been carried into another world—a world that was at once primeval yet powerful; a world of dreaming trees, singing streams and silent peaks, a realm in which law and order reigned, untroubled by one determined young man whose power was derived from the president himself. She felt safe entirely safe for just across the roaring mountain torrent the two intrepid guardians of the forest were ensconced. One of them, it was come of Swedish parentage, and the other, was a native of England, but they were both American in the high sense of being loyal to the federal will, and she trusted them more unquestioningly than any other men in all that west save only Redfield. She had no doubt there were others equally loyal, equally to be trusted, but she did not know them.

WHERE MONEY GOES

Over Three Million Dollars Are Required

To Put the State of Michigan on a Good Business Basis.

Chairman Chambers of the ways and means committee of the house expects, if the general budget bill goes through as recommended by the committee, that the state of Michigan will be on a good financial basis at the beginning of the next session of the legislature. As stated the budget calls for $2,000,000 for 1911 and $1,833,000 for 1912, a total of $3,833,000.

"I think this budget will put the state on a first class business basis," said Chairman Chambers. "To my mind there is no excuse for carelessness, to raise less than enough money to meet the expenses of the government. We have gone over every item with care and believe the budget is ample without being larger by a dollar than is required."

The ways and means committee has reported on the state highway department appropriation of $100,000, which is $20,000 more than two years ago, and there is a strong sentiment among members of the committee in favor of allowing $150,000 for a new cell block at Jackson prison.

The budget, however, has to do with the fixed expenses of the state as shown by expenses in the past. For instance, it includes the salaries of state officers, which total $110,000 annually. Extra clerk hire runs to $105,000 and the salary of the state industry amounts to $20,000, while the judges' expenses are an additional $5,000. The expense of operating the legislature is $185,000. In connection with the proposal to establish a central board of control there is mention of interest included in the statement made by State Accountant Hamilton for the committee which shows that the expense of the several boards of control of state institutions amount to $87,000.

The state game and fish warden's department costs annually $18,000, but a large portion of the expense is received back in fees and fines and from the sale of confiscated game and fish.

One big item is that of transporting prisoners to the several prisons and transporting convicts to the state schools, which costs approximately $30,000.

The county normal training classes, where teachers are trained for the rural schools, cost $10,000. The care of juvenile offenders in an institution of $11,000. The state pays $20,000 annually toward teaching deaf children in the public schools. Every year the board of state auditors audits accounts for the departments and institutions, amounting to $300,000. Lawsuits, in which the state constantly is involved, cost $10,000 annually.

There is an item of $45,000 for the expenses of the state tax commission which undoubtedly will be doubled during the next biennial

DON'T BE BALD

Nearly Anyone May Secure a Splendid Growth of Hair.

We have a remedy that has a record of growing hair and curing baldness in 93 out of every 100 cases where used according to directions for a reasonable length of time. That may seem like a strong statement—it is, and we mean it to be, and no one should doubt it until they have put our claims to the test.

We are so certain Rexall's Hair Tonic will cure dandruff, prevent baldness, stimulate the scalp and hair roots, stop falling hair and grow new hair, that we personally give our positive guarantee to refund every penny paid as for it in every instance where it does not give entire satisfaction to the user.

Rexall's Hair Tonic is as pleasant to use as clear spring water. It is delightfully perfumed, and does not grease or gum the hair. Two sizes, 50c and $1.00. With our guarantee back of it, you certainly take no risk. Sold only at our store, "The Rexall Store"—The Ivy Drug store, E. N. Metcalf proprietor.

period under the broadened authority which the legislature has conferred on that body. For miscellaneous expenses it is estimated that $120,000 is required. Those are the main items, and in addition there are numerous smaller amounts which have to be paid for fees and salaries, publication of laws and expenses of various kinds.

One thing the ways and means committee are working out for with great care this year is to prevent the appropriation of money for certain things without including a tax clause in the bill. The legislature of 1909 put across bills of that character to the tune of $53,110.

Three sets of second hand double work harness for sale at Benj. Brown.

OPEN ON HOLIDAYS

House Agrees to Let Saloons Open More Than Formerly.

Last week the house agreed on the bill to give saloons the right to stay open on certain holidays. It will probably pass without opposition.

The present law provides that saloons shall be closed on all election days and the new bill changed this to general election days, which has been held to be the fall election, so an amendment was passed adding any regular city, village and township election. The bill also provided that saloons shall be closed on general primary days, until after the polls closed and another amendment was adopted adding local primary election days. Representative Perry tried to add New Year's day to the list of holidays for which the saloons must be closed, but lost out by a vote of 34 to 20, a third of the members voting the vote.

"The bill will not be ready for passage on third reading until later, but with the amendments added today it will not meet with opposition. As the bill now stands, saloons will be closed on Sundays, on general election days, and regular city, village and township election days, on Christmas, Memorial day, Thanksgiving, Fourth of July, Labor day, and on general and local primary election days until after the close of the polls.

USES OF THE BARLEY CROP.

Nearly Equal to Corn in Feeding Value—Directions For Preparation.

Barley is nearly equal to corn in value for feeding purposes, but should not make up more than half of the grain ration for horses and cattle. For the best results in feeding to horses and cattle it should be crushed or coarsely ground, as this aids digestion and also reduces the danger of injury to the mouths of the animals from the heads. For hog feed, simply soaking the whole grain overnight will suffice. The most kind of bacon is produced from feeding ground barley mixed with skim milk. Barley is also an excellent feed for sheep. It can be fed whole or crushed.

Barley properly cut and cured will furnish a very nutritious hay that is readily eaten by all kinds of stock. When intended for hay it should be sown more thickly than when intended for grain. In growing winter barley for hay the most commonly made is in letting the crop become too ripe in the field that better results will be secured if the grain is allowed to fall. This is done at the expense of the stem and leaves as much of the material from which the grain is produced is stored there. The barley is best if cut and fed too long before cutting. The heads become hard and will injure the mouths of the animals. When the crop is cut in the flowering stage the heads are soft and will be found to be less injurious than if allowed to ripen further. The crop can be cut with a mower and hauled like other hay.

WINTER BARLEY—GROWN BARLEY.
(From bulletin, United States department of agriculture.)

Spring barley should be sown as early as possible in the spring after the danger of severe frosts is over. The plant has a large, juicy stem and very broad green leaves. As the heads are not headed, this variety is preferable to the Triticum for silage and hay making purposes. If sown early it will grow rapidly and yield a large quantity of excellent green feed, relished by all kinds of stock. If cut when the heads are in the milk stage it will yield a large crop of nutritious hay that will give better results in feeding than will any other hay. Bulletin of United States department of agriculture.

Pruning in Winter.

Now is the best time to take out dead wood. A few old and decayed trees, say the American Cedar, etc., some of the leaves are still out, and it is easy to pick out dead limbs. Pruning now will save much extra work in the spring, when a time is so long. Moreover, many diseases and insects will be destroyed. To make sure of it turn the limbs. Dead limbs provide excellent camping grounds for insects and diseases. Always cut close to the trunk, do not leave a stub.

made this impracticable, and then efforts were focussed to keep the flames down to where they would not spread beyond the limits of the block and in this the department was successful, though the entire row of frame buildings to the Basha office on Petoskey street was practically gutted, but how it was ever possible to save buildings on Lake street backing onto the burned district is a miracle.

The Finley building, next west of the Hankey block was doomed from the first, and nothing of the contents of the lower floor, the old Racket stock, owned by K. C. Ames was saved, though Mrs. Cucklin and her daughter, Miss Finley, saved the greater and most valuable part of their household goods. The Morgan Meat market, owned by Long & Son in the west room of the lower part of this building was practically saved, though the valuable freezer was sacrificed to the flames, there not being a sufficient force to remove it. S. A. Wilson, who conducted a grocery in the adjoining room, in the double store owned by Dr. O. D. Ramsdell, got the greater part of his stock to safety, and the Salvation Army in the other room saved the greater part of its unexpired aid war, the boss drum, bags, etc. The upstairs was occupied by a family, but all household furniture was saved therefrom. The next building, owned by C. R. Pratt, was unoccupied except by a barber shop, and it is a total wreck, but helped save the rest of Mitchell street to the bridge on that side of the street, for the wind was blowing in that direction, and houses blocks away in the line of the wind were ignited from the flying sparks.

Just what will be done in the matter of rebuilding is not yet known, none of the lot owners being yet in position to state what they are able to do, but the locations are too valuable to be long left idle.

The total loss will approximate a hundred thousand dollars, the Hankey block and the Gardner stock being the greatest losers. The block was worth about thirty-five thousand dollars, and the stock at twenty five thousand dollars, while the rest was distributed between the remaining six rooms, the Racket stock being estimated at between six and seven thousand dollars. Mr. Newton's loss of tools will amount to about one hundred and fifty dollars. No insurance. Value of the Ramsdell building unknown, insurance one thousand dollars, not nearly half covering the loss.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND

Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

She rose to a complete understanding of Cavanagh's love for "the high country" and his enthusiasm for the cause, a cause which was able to bring together the student from Yale and the graduates of Bergen and of Oxford and make them comrades in preserving the trees and streams of the mountain states against the encroachments of some of their own citizens, who were openly, short-sightedly and cynically bent upon destruction, spoliation and abuse.

She had listened to the talk of the forester and the supervisor, and she had learned from them that Cavanagh was sure of swift advancement now that he had shown his courage and his skill, and the thought that he might leave the state to take charge of another forest brought her some uneasiness, for she and Lee had planned to go to Sulphur City. She had consented to this because it still left to her the possibility of occasionally seeing or hearing from Cavanagh. But the thought that he might go away altogether took some of the music out of the sound of the stream and made the future vaguely sad.

For the next two days Cavanagh slept but little, for his patient grew steadily worse. As the flame of his fever mounted, Wetherford pleaded for aid. The ranger threw open the doors, admitting freely the cool, sweet mountain wind. He brought as well the of a draft as another, and his thought, and by the use of cold cloths he tried to allay the burning heat of the pain.

With the coming of the third night Wetherford was unconscious and unrecognizable to any one who had known him in the days of "the free range." He was going as the wild west was going, discolored, disfigured, and sound, incapable of rebirth, yet carrying something fine to his grave. He had acted the part of a brave man; that shall be said of him. He had gone to the rescue of the poor Basque lustrelessly, with the same reckless disregard of consequences to himself which marked his character when he was a cowboy on the range. He had set aside the more difficult tasks for his own love or gain. His regard for the ranger into whose care he was now about to commit his wife and daughter persisted in spite of his suffering. In him was his love, his stay, his strength, in a final moment, he preferred to the promise which he had drawn from Cavanagh.

"If I go you must take care of my girl—the one of Lee's too. Promise me that. Do you promise?" he insisted.

"I promise on honor," Ross repeated, and with a faint pressure of his hand on Lee's forehead and cheek, Wetherford sank away into the dream which deepened hour by hour, broken now and then by convulsions, which wrung the stern heart of the ranger till his hands trembled for pity.

The day was well advanced when the sound of rattling pebbles on the hill back of his cabin drew his attention, and a few moments later a man on a weary horse rode up to his door and dropped heavily from the saddle. He was a small, dark individual, with spectacles, plaid of the city.

"Howdy," Smallpox called Ross as his visitor drew near the door.

The new-comer waved his hand contemptuously. "I've had it. Are you Ross Cavanagh?"

"I am."

"My name is Hartley. I represent the Denver Roundup. I'm interested

"I'VE HAD IT."

In this sheep herder killing—merely as a reporter," he added, with a fleeting smile. "Did you know old man Dunn of Deer Creek had committed suicide?"

Cavanagh started and his face set.

"They found him shot through the neck and dying this morning. As he was gasping his last breath he said, 'The ranger knows, and when they asked, 'What ranger?' he said, 'Cavanagh.' When I heard that I jumped a horse and beat out all over here. Is this true? Did he tell you who the murderers are?"

Cavanagh did not answer at once. He was like a man caught on a swing ing bridge, and his first instinct was to catch the swing to get his balance. "Wait a minute. What is it all to you?"

Again that peculiar grin lighted the small man's dark, unwholesome face. "It's a fine detective story, and besides, it means $20 per column and maybe a 'boost.' I can't wait; you can't wait. It's up to us to strike now. If these men knew you have their names they'd like for Texas or the high seas. Come now. Everybody tells me you're one of those idealistic highbrow rangers who care more for the future of the west than most natural born westerners. What's your plan? If you'll yoke up with me we'll run these devils into the earth and wipe out their names and you'll be doing the whole country a service."

The ranger studied the small figure before him with penetrating gaze. There was deliberate fearlessness in the stranger's face and eyes, and notwithstanding his calm, almost languid movement, restless energy could be detected in his voice.

"What is your plan?" the ranger asked.

"Get ourselves deputized by the court and jump these men before they realize that there's anything doing. They count the whole country on their side, but they're mistaken. They've counted on themselves this time, and a tremendous reaction has set in. Every body knows you've held an even hand over these warring factions and Scots, and the court will be glad to deputize you to bring them to justice. The old sheriff is paralyzed. Everybody knows that the assassins are poolroom cattle ranchers, and yet in one darned move, it's up to you fellows, who represent law and order, to act quick."

Cavanagh followed him with complete comprehension, and a desire to carry out the plan seized upon him. "I'd do it if I could," he said, "but it happens I am nursing a sick man. I am perhaps already exposed to the same disease. I can't leave here for a week or more. It would not be right for me to expose others."

"Don't worry about that. Take a hot bath, fumigate your clothing, shave your head. I'll fix you up, and I'll get some one to take your place." Fatching sight of Swenson and Lee on the bridge, he asked: "Who are those people? Can't they take your nursing job?"

"No," answered Cavanagh firmly. "It's no use. I can't join you in this, at least not now."

"But you'll give me the names which Dunn gave you?"

"No, I can't do that. I shall tell the supervisor, and he can't as he says it. For the present I'm backed up here."

The other man looked the disappointment he felt. "I'm sorry you don't feel like opening up. You know just as well that nothing will ever be done about this thing unless the press insists upon it. It's up to you and me, the representatives of the conscience of the east," here he winked an eye, "and you federal authority to do what we can to bring these men to their punishment. Better reconsider. I'm spending now as a citizen as well as a reporter."

There was much truth in what he said, but Cavanagh refused to go further in the matter until he had consulted with Ross.

"Very well," replied Hartley. "That's settled. By the way, who is your patient?"

"Eloquently, concisely, Ross told the story. 'Just a poor old mounted hero, a survival of the cowboy west,' he said, 'but he had the heart of a hero in him, and I'm doing my best to save him.'"

Keep him in the dark—that's the best theory—do under a red cloth. While light brings out the ulcers." "The James darkness. That's one reason why I've opened the doors and windows."

"All wrong. According to Finson, he wouldn't get in the dark. However, it doesn't matter on a cowboy. You've a great story yourself. There's a fine situation here, which I'll play up if you don't object."

Cavanagh smiled. "Would my objection have any weight?"

The reporter laughed. "Not much. I've got to carry back some sort of game. Well, so long. I must hit the trail over the hill."

Cavanagh made civil answer and returned to his patient more than half convinced that Hartley was right. The "power of the press" might prove to be a very real force in this pursuit.

As the journalist was about to mount his horse he discovered Lee Virginia on the other side of the creek. "Hello," said he. "I wonder what this pretty maiden means." And, dropping his bridle rein again, he walked down to the bridge.

Swenson interposed his tall figure. "What do you want?" he asked bluntly. "You don't want to get too close. You've been talking to the ranger."

Hartley studied him coolly. "Are you a ranger too?"

"No, only a guard."

"Why are you leaving Cavanagh to play it alone to there?"

Lee explained. "He won't let any of us come near him."

"Quite right," retorted Hartley promptly. "They say smallpox has lost its terrors, but when you're eight hours' hard trail from a doctor or a hospital it's still what I'd call a formidable enemy. However, Cavanagh's immune, so he says."

TAX DECISION ON PRIVILEGES.

Interesting Points in Supreme Court's Findings.

IS IT AGAINST INCOME TAX?

Holds That Congress Has Complete
Taxing Power Rather Than Courts.
Corporation Tax Is in the Nature of an Excise on Privileges Granted.
May Become Precedent of Farreaching Consequences.

One of the most important inferences to be deduced from the corporation-tax decision is the apparent sympathy of the court as at present organized with the decision that threw out the income tax of 1894 as unconstitutional. This expression, of course, is indirect, but it leaves scarcely a doubt. As the proposed constitutional amendment expressly conveying to congress the power to levy an income tax without regard to population is coming a rough road through the state legislature, it is likely that when next the subject of an income tax is introduced in congress this decision will be extensively quoted from. The distinction is pointed out sharply that where the old tax was a levy on property merely because of its ownership this levy is an excise tax upon the privilege of doing business in a particular way. On this point the court says:

"The tax under consideration as we have construed the statute may be described as an excise upon the particular privilege of doing business in a corporate capacity—i. e., with the advantages which arise from corporate or quasi corporate organization—or when applied to insurance companies for doing the business of such companies. The requirement to pay such taxes involves the exercise of privileges, and the element of absolute and unequivocal demand is lacking. If business is not done in the manner described in the statute no tax is payable."

That is the heart of the court's answer to the plea that the tax is in effect a direct tax and therefore unconstitutional.

No agency is allowed by the court to the argument against the right of congress to impose an excise tax upon franchises granted by the states.

"The constitution contains only two limitations on the right of congress to levy excise taxes," says the decision. "They must be levied for the public welfare and are required to be uniform throughout the United States."

In affirming the federal power to tax state corporations, the court holds that "the revenue of the United States must be collected from the same territory from the same people, and excise taxes must be collected from the same activities as are also levied by the states in order to support their local governments."

Corporation Privileges Taxed.

The plea that the tax is not uniform because it discriminates so sharply against corporations in favor of business done by partnerships or private persons the court answers simply by stating that uniformity, in the sense used by the constitution, means only geographical uniformity. "The practice has always been to levy on some occupations and to omit others, and this is true of both the states and the federal government. Besides this, the advantages to be derived from a corporate existence are such as to make the distinction very real and reasonable."

"The thing taxed," said Justice Day,

"is not the mere dealing in merchandise, in which the actual transactions may be the same, whether conducted by individuals or corporations, but the tax is laid upon the privileges which exist in conducting business with the advantages which inhere in the corporate capacity of those taxed and which are not enjoyed by private firms or individuals. These advantages are obvious and have led to the formation of such companies in nearly all branches of trade. The continuity of the business, without interruption by death or dissolution, the transfer of property interests by the disposition of shares of stock, the advantages of business controlled and managed by corporate directors, the general absence of individual liability, these and other things inhere in the advantages of business thus conducted, which do not exist when the same business is conducted by private individuals or partnerships. It is this distinctive privilege which is the subject of taxation, not the mere buying or selling or handling of goods, which may be the same, whether done by corporations or individuals."

In holding that insurance companies cannot escape the tax because so great a part of their property is invested in nontaxable municipal or state bonds the supreme court holds that "this argument confuses the measure of the tax upon privileges with direct taxation of the estate or thing taxed." Such a measure, says the court, it is altogether within the power of congress to choose, whether it has an immediate reference to the business done or not.

"We must not forget," says the court, "that the right to select the measure and objects of taxation devolves upon the congress and not upon the courts, and such select as are valid unless constitutional limitations are applicable."

Harmony Grange No. 1451.
Harmony Grange held an interesting and profitable meeting on Tuesday evening. There was a good attendance and a fine program was rendered. It being the first meeting since the beginning of the contest a considerable interest was shown in the number of points each side would win. Miss Leller's side won with a score of 100 to 130.

Other granges please take notice that we are going after first prize in the grange exhibit at the fair next fall and to that end have appointed a committee consisting of O. D. Willson, W. C. Burdick and Mrs. H. L. Willson to have charge of the preparation of the exhibit and to begin now. We at least expect to beat our last year's exhibit and gain some valuable experience whether we win a prize or not.

EXHIBIT CUT OUT

Development Bureau Will Work Along New Lines

Demonstration in Proper Care of Orchards to be Given

At the meeting of the executive committee of the Western Michigan Development bureau held last week several matters of importance to the future of the organization were taken up and disposed of in a satisfactory manner.

One of the most important things decided upon was the cutting out of the exhibit at the Chicago land show, where western Michigan has made such an impression during the past two years. This action was taken on account of the great expense of exhibiting and maintaining the exhibit, which costs about $40 per day during the continuance of the show. While good results have been obtained from this exhibit they were not in proportion to the cost that the bureau was put to each year. The same amount of money expended in other directions will, it is figured, bring better results that will be of more permanent nature and do more for the territory covered by the bureau.

It is planned to bring the working of the bureau down to a very practical basis this year and with that object in view it was decided to hire two light men whose duty it will be to go into the orchards of western Michigan and give the people actual demonstrations in the best methods in raising for the trees at the different times of the year. They will teach the owners how to spray properly, how to prune, and distinguish the various diseases which the trees are subjected to in the state. These men will be experts in their line of business and will work under the direction of Secretary Gibson.

Special attention will be given by these men to old orchards and one of their duties will be to show the people how to make these neglected orchards come back and grow a profitable crop of fruit, no matter how long they may have been neglected. This work will be carried out in the southern part of the state and the results have been highly satisfactory to all concerned.

Another plan that was adopted at the meeting was the setting aside of the sum of $1,000 which will be used for advertising western Michigan in the leading agricultural magazines and papers throughout the country. This, it is figured, will be money well spent, as it will call the attention of interested people to our advantages and start them to making inquiries that will result in bringing a good percentage of them here as residents or investors.

The question of carrying traveling exhibits of fruit which will be taken from place to place and exhibited at the time the illustrated lecture is given was discussed and thought favorably of by the directors present. The value of this method lies in the fact that the people all over the district can see some of the fruit, while if the large display is held only a small part of the public ever gets a chance to see the products that are being grown. This scheme will be developed later in the season.

Many of the transportation men were present at the meeting and were well pleased with the results of the work during the past year, and the indications are that the companies will contribute a much larger amount to the fund for maintaining the bureau the coming year. The work has reached a point where the results are satisfactory and they want to see it carried out along the lines that have been mapped by the directors.

The annual meeting of the bureau will be held in Traverse City on May 3, at which time the officers will be elected and directors named from the twenty counties.

STATE TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

A teachers' institute has been appointed for Charlevoix county the same to be held in the city of Charlevoix on Friday and Saturday, April 7 and 8, 1911.

Prof. R. D. Calkins of Mt. Pleasant has been appointed as instructor and he will have charge of the meeting.

Prof. Calkins is a specialist in the line of geography and will give a course of lectures on this subject that no teacher in the county can afford to miss.

This meeting was appointed by the department for an earlier date but owing to the prevailing health conditions of the county at that time it was thought unwise to hold same.

We realize that the date as set is a little late but hope that it will serve to brighten the pathway of the teacher whose pupils yawn and look toward the front streams during the warm weather of the closing months of the term.

Full program will be mailed to teachers this week.

Teachers will be expected to close their schools on Friday and will receive a certificate of attendance which will entitle them to pay for day.

It may require an effort on the part of some of the teachers of the county to reach Charlevoix but the meeting will be worth the effort.

Take due notice thereof and meet with us at Charlevoix on April 7 and 8.

PROPER CARE OF ORCHARDS

day or so, and if you see any effects of fungus get busy and spray, and check it if possible. Apples are easily affected in damp, sultry weather. It has what is called pulley, or a very fine fuzz which makes it very easy for fungus to make an attack.

I have seen the fungus attack the apple when half grown, so you see you will have to be on your guard to grow first class apples, and you cannot afford to grow any other kind, and I know Grand Traverse county can grow them.

As to crop of apples this year I will say that I will have a full crop I never made a misleading statement in regard to my crop as I can depend on my orchard. I don't care anything about the condition of the weather. I would be lost without a crop and that has not happened yet, and I know the condition it went into the winter.

So far, the apple, cherry and peach trees have gone through the winter in excellent shape. Yet many times when they have done so we have lost our peach and cherry crops, but I do not look for any bad effects this spring.

I am very glad that the boys did not freeze over this winter, as I want a crop of peaches this year. When the boys freeze early it generally gets lots colder, and we are liable to lose our peach crop, and that would mean a lot to me.

BUSINESS SIDE OF FRUIT GROWING

Article Prepared by C. N. Russell of

READ AT RALLY AT BEAR LAKE

Five Drawbacks to Fruit Business Enumerated

Crooked Real Estate Work, Crooked Selling of Stock, Insurance, Transportation, Insolvency to Get the Right Price for Fruit.

The following article was prepared by C. N. Russell of Manistee and read at the Western Michigan Development Bureau rally at Bear Lake. In many respects it is the best statement of conditions that has ever been written. The author has many years of experience as a fruit buyer and shipper and is himself a producer of all common kinds of orchards produce.

As many of you know I have been engaged in buying and selling fancy fruits for the last fifteen years, but it is only within the last six years that I have personally had anything to do with the growing of it. Therefore, it is hardly necessary for me to say that I am not here to pose as a fruit growing expert. When you have such men as Paul Rose just across the county line and Mr. Hopkins right here at home, men who have made success of the fruit growing business and from whom any one can get advice and the benefit of their many years' experience for the asking, it is foolish for any city man like myself to come here to talk on how to grow fruit. To use the old saying it is "carrying coals to Newcastle," because you can get much better information than I am able to offer.

I wish, however, to call your attention to a few of the things which in my estimation have tended to make the profits which one should obtain from fruit growing, less than one-half as large as they should be. Some of these things have already hit my own profits, and I am sure that everyone here who is interested in the fruit business has had the same things to contend with, at least some of them.

As the fruit business is conducted in the northern Michigan section at the present time, the whole proposition is too liable to be a skin game from start to finish at least for many of us.

First, the fixy real estate dealer gets in his little work. He either charges two prices for what he sells or else sells something that turns out to be of very little value—sometimes he "sinks" us both ways. Now I don't wish to go on record as stating that all real estate dealers are crooked, because some of the straightest men I know are in the business, but in my estimation during the last ten years, crooked real estate work has hurt this section more than any other one thing.

After the real estate men get through with us along comes the agent selling fruit trees and nursery stock. Now, I know a few honest men who are in the business, I also know a lot of dishonest fellows. Very few of the honest ones are properly qualified for business. They either do not know enough about what they are selling or else they don't know enough about what we ought to plant, and I have never found one yet, honest or dishonest, who wouldn't try to sell me from two to three times as many trees for a given space of ground as really needed. The honest agents who have unknowingly led us astray, and the dishonest ones that have always soaked us at every opportunity have done us a wrong which will show itself more in the years to come than at the present time. It seems to me that the only way to get nursery stock is to get it direct from some reliable nursery unless we know that Mr. Agent is honest and knows his business.

After we have bought our land and planted our trees then we come to a step in the game where we begin to skin ourselves. How many of us are contemplating going into the fruit business have spent any time studying up on the subject? How many who are already in the game in a small way, have taken pains to acquire any knowledge about the business? I think I can truthfully say not one in twenty. In driving from Narsaw to Bear Lake recently I noticed an orchard on nearly every farm and of the orchards I saw just two that seemed to have received intelligent care. The doctor, the lawyer, the banker, the engineer, the merchant, in fact in every profession or business, require a special education.

It seems to me that it is time to quit placing our trust in the Lord and begin to do a little something for ourselves, and we can't do very much unless we know about what we ought to do. It's easy to get information about the fruit growing business. First, we have the successful fruit growers to go to. The state is glad to send free of charge, any of its numerous pamphlets and the department of agriculture at Washington has many free publications treating of every phase and branch of fruit growing which are free for the asking. At the request of many grange or other society I will personally send a list of such free publications as are available with instructions as how to get them. I will say I have many of these pamphlets and the information I have gained from them has been very valuable to me.

I have proven three ways in which the fruit business is liable to prove a skin game. Next comes the transportation problem. We know that transportation facilities from Bear Lake are at the present are nothing to brag about. It is to be regretted that a feasible rail route to Bear Lake has not been found. Especially in the case of Bear Lake is a railroad needed, because it is not possible to successfully ship the most perishable fruits to markets other than Milwaukee and Chicago, and the advantages of refrigerator car services to the southern, eastern and northwestern markets are not available. About the only way to ship is by boat from Onekama to Milwaukee or Chicago. The Chicago service has been greatly improved, the rates are perhaps a little high, but the fruits are carefully handled and well taken care of. As to the Milwaukee service, the rates are much too high and the fruit is often terribly used. I have seen the Milwaukee boat come into Manistee from the north loaded to the guards with a mixed up mess of peaches, plums, pears and apples with here and there a crate of strawberries, everything thrown in together, wrong side up, barrels of apples on top of basket of fancy peaches, and to cap the climax, a temperature of 100 degrees on account of the hot steam pipes running the entire length of the deck. You can imagine in what condition that fruit is in when it reaches the market.

And then there is the commission man! You will know him, I started out to say just what I thought about the commission man, but have had to tone down my remarks because they were so hot that the paper began to smoke. I have had a lot of experience with him, both in buying and shipping and I have nearly always got it in the neck (both ways).

He gets your little shipment of ten cases of raspberries and in the course of a few days sends returns that read something like this:

1 crate reds	at $1.50	$1.50
2 crates reds	at $1.00	$2.00
1 crate reds	at $1.40	$1.40
3 crates red soft	at $1.00	$3.00
Commission		$13.55
Freight charges		$1.35
Cartage		$2.00
Net		$11.50

Strange isn't it that he almost never sells more than one or two crates at the top market price, except early in the season when he wants to get you in line for the later and heavier shipments. And then the apples—He gets a mixed shipment of say 50 barrels, 10 barrels of fancy Spys, 10 barrels of Kings, fancy, and the rest just common stock. He is not supposed to send returns until the shipment is all sold but let us see just what he does. He takes the 10 barrels of fancy Spys and the 10 barrels of fancy Kings and hands them over to the odd storage house. Your 30 barrels of common stock he sells all at once and sends returns about as follows:

GOLDEN POTLATCH

Charlevoix Girl Wins Prize of Fifty Dollars

Out of Five Hundred Contestants In Naming — Big Carnival.

Miss Pearl V. Duff, a Charlevoix girl, who has been teaching in the public school of Washington state for the past five years was the fortunate winner of the fifty dollar prize offered by the Seattle carnival association for a name for the annual carnival. "Golden Potlatch" was the name selected, out of over five thousand suggestions, the winning name being picked by Miss Duff and Leigh D. Bruckhart, each of whom will receive fifty dollars.

To those acquainted with the life and traditions of the north coast Indian, this title will appeal as the most appropriate one that could be suggested. "Potlatch" is taken from the Chinook jargon, and like many other words of the Indian dialects may be used either as a verb or a noun.

As a verb Potlatch means "to give" as a noun it applies to the occasion on which gifts are made.

J. A. Costello, in his work on Indian history, says: "The potlatch was the greatest institution of the Indian and is to this day. It was the crowning glory of Indian life and worth the need of a thousand victories over the foe. It was the ambition of the high tier, the politics of every ruler who could secure wealth enough to accomplish the great and glorious end. It impoverished the giver, but brought gladness to the hearts of the people and honor ever after to him that gave."

Among the north coast Indians a potlatch has always been an important event. The man who intends to become host of a potlatch begins his plans years in advance of the event by starting in to hoard everything of any value that comes into his hands. Stinting himself and his family, he will put away money, blankets, calicoes, shoes, clothing, hats and all sorts of things.

When he considers the accumulation of sufficient size he will invite all members of the tribe, and perhaps of other tribes, to a great festival. This may continue for several days, all the guests being entertained at the host's expense, with games, dances, contests, music and everything that may pleasantly pass the time away.

But the crowning feature from which the celebration takes its name comes on the last day, when the host, or somebody acting for him, calls forward by name each guest and gives to him or her some present as nearly suitable as the host's resources will permit.

It always is the ambition of the host to absolutely impoverish himself and family, but the process makes him a big chief and he holds high place thereafter until some fellow tribesman comes forward with a bigger celebration and a greater number of gifts.

"The nearest accurate translation of the words 'Golden Potlatch' that can be given is a festival in honor of the gift of gold," said James P. Wood, who is in charge of the publicity for the forthcoming celebration and who spent many years among the Coast Indians. "It might be construed to mean a festival at which gifts of gold would be made, but it is not in this sense that the name has been adopted by the carnival association. It is, in fact, to be a celebration of the gold, an gift made to the world by Alaska and the Yukon through Seattle and this is entirely appropriate."

C. H. S. BASE BALL TEAM

Begin Practice for the Season of 1911

Monday

Material Promises to Make Another Winning Team.

The C. H. S. base ball team was on deck Monday, for the first practice of the season. There were five last year's players back and with the help of the new material the C. H. S. expects to have a winning team, although we lost our last year's players we have two promising young lads who will be able to fill that position in Wallace and Gaskin; Captain Krehlik is showing up in the same old style behind the bat, Crace and Kirby are showing up better than can be expected at first. Bob Bridge, who was with us last year, is covering the second sack in great shape, Mitchell, who did great work in the field last year is doing as good at third this year; Harry Cohen, although a new man to the game, is showing up good at short. We have very promising material for the outfield in Blair, Scroggie, M. Cohen, Blair, Weed and Cohen.

Most of the people of our beautiful little city know the fame that Mr. Wise gained last fall by coaching the foot-ball team to victory and expects him to do the same in baseball this spring with the noble assistance of Mr. Miller.

STACKS-MAYNE

Charlevoix Young People Married Wednesday Evening.

Last Wednesday evening, at the Episcopal church, Rev. Mr. Westman of Petoskey, in the presence of a number of invited guests pronounced the words which united together two of Charlevoix's most popular young people—popular because of their sterling worth. Don H. Stacks, son of E. S. Stacks and Miss E. Marie Mayne, eldest daughter of Judge and Mrs. E. W. Mayne.

The church was most beautifully decorated in green and white. The bride was assisted by her sister Miss Nita, maid of honor, while Thomas Monroe of Chicago performed a like service for the groom. The bridesmaids were Miss Gail Cruikshank and Miss Maynard Stacks, Catherine Fitching, teacher, ushers, Ainslee and Cleland Mayne, Miss Sara Levinson played Handel's wedding march as the bridal party entered and Miss Elizabeth Pinnau sang "Be Thou Faithful Unto Death," presiding the ceremony.

Mr. and Mrs. Stacks left for Noline, Illinois, on the evening train where Mr. Stacks is employed as chief chemist for the John Deere Company.

TALE OF FOUR INDIANS

Rough House at Bay Shore Sunday Evening.

Three are in County Jail. One Bound Over to Circuit Court.

Sunday night Under-sheriff Nival and Deputy Coon were called to Bay Shore by reports that a bunch of Indians were raising a rough house at the home of Mrs. Susan Greenish. On reaching the scene of disturbance they found that a genuine rough house had been raised, everything in the house being smashed.

Three Indians, Mrs. Eliza Tupken-Yahr, John Wincovy and Tom Fisher were found in a beastly state of intoxication and were brought to this city and lodged in jail.

Monday morning the trio was brought before Justice Collins, who investigated the matter, and found out that the whiskey was purchased in Mackinaw City by Mrs. Greenish, on money furnished by the prisoners. Mrs. Greenish was found over the amount court on her own recognition of a charge of violating the local option law and the others drew a fine of five dollars each, and costs or ten days in jail, and having the money they are now boarding with Mr. Coon.

BELIEVES IN GOOD ROADS

South Arm to Expend $5,000 in Road Improvement.

The annual town meeting Monday afternoon was not so largely attended as some of those of former years nevertheless there was a good crowd present and each individual was a good roads booster.

When the matter of raising money for highway improvements came up Mr. H. L. Olney explained the project to build two miles of state aid macadam road in this township during the coming summer and moved that the sum of $5,000 be raised by tax for highway improvement purposes. The motion was enthusiastically seconded and carried with hardly a dissenting vote. It develops, however that it will not be possible to raise so large an amount as this owing to the fact that the state law has placed a limit of one-half of one per cent on the assessed valuation of the township. Last year our valuation was a trifling over $1,000,000 making $5,000 all that can be legally raised here this year for highway improvement purposes. It is thought that by the practice of the most rigid economy this amount will suffice to carry out the work planned.

A road repair fund of one-fourth of one per cent was voted, likewise a contingent fund of $2,000 to meet the current expense of conducting the business affairs of the township. —East Jordan Enterprise.

FIELD MAN EMPLOYED

Western Michigan Development Bureau Secures C. E. Smith

Of Agricultural College to Teach Better Farming.

C. E. Smith of the Michigan Agricultural college has been employed by the Western Michigan Development bureau, as one of the field men authorized at the meeting of the executive committee held last week. His work will be to instruct the farmers of Western Michigan how to get better results from their farms, by the application of the best methods that are known to agricultural science.

The work will be started at Hart next Monday, and practical orchard demonstrations will be given whenever the opportunity offers, and lectures will be delivered at places where a crowd can be collected. Evening meetings in the villages are also planned during the season. Special attention will be given the orchards and all the best methods known to the horticulturists will be taught the fruit growers. This work has been conducted upon a small scale during the past year and has proved satisfactory that there is a great demand for more of it in all the counties where fruit crops is an important factor. For some time Mr. Smith will travel with Secretary Gibson, and after he gets the lay of the land he will conduct his work alone.

Later in the season it is proposed to hire another man to work along the same lines as the demand is such that one man cannot possibly cover the territory comprised in the bureau.

INSTITUTE WAS GRAND SUCCESS

Over One Hundred Charlevoix County Teachers in Attendance

FRIDAY AND SATURDAY LAST WEEK

Professor Calkins of Mt. Pleasant Explained Geography

State Travelling Libraries Work Explained Every Portion of the Program was Highly Enjoyed by All

The enrollment at the institute held in Charlevoix last week was just about 100 of which 11 were rural teachers representing every township in the county except those on the islands. Thirty of the city teachers were in attendance and the rest of the enrollment consisted of normal students, teachers from other counties and teachers from this county but who are not in the work this year.

The program throughout was a most enjoyable one and those present enjoyed every minute of the time.

The meeting was called to order promptly at each session, and the devotionals were conducted by Rev. Ehle and Rev. Putnam.

The singing of the 7th and 8th grades was a treat to the teachers and incidentally something of a tribute to the ability of the teachers who have had this work in charge in the Charlevoix schools. Miss Doherty of Charlevoix and Miss Freilberg of East Jordan delighted the teachers with their readings and stories.

The high school orchestra entertained with a number of well rendered selections.

Superintendent Butler of Boyne left some excellent ideas with the teachers. Miss Whiting of the county normal gave some instruction in the art of map making and Mr. Bashaw gave a short and interesting talk regarding the work of the transit officer.

Mr. Bailey, who is traveling for the State Library commission, was there with one of the state traveling libraries and explained the work very neatly. The teachers of the county were interested in this library matter and it is likely that a number of them will be placed in the schools of the county.

The evening entertainment, The Music Makers, was a treat to all who attended and did its full portion in making the whole meeting an enjoyable one.

We all agree, however, that all of these minor and pleasant portions would hardly have made the meeting worth while had it not been for the series of excellent lectures on the subject of "Geography" that was given during the meeting.

We will not attempt to give a detailed account of the lectures, but will say that Prof. R. D. Calkins of Mt. Pleasant knows the subject of geography and knows how to get people interested in the subject.

Prof. Calkins said to the writer that he had never had such close attention as was given by the teachers. Well I am sure to say that the teachers never have had the subject of geography presented to them in quite such an excellent manner and his work here during the two days will be of untold value to the pupils of the Charlevoix county schools.

The teachers of the Charlevoix schools and the normal class gave a reception to the visiting teachers and did their full share in making the meeting one that will be remembered by every one present as a very enjoyable affair.

All together it was one of the most successful institutes that has ever been held in the county.

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND
Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

CHAPTER XX—Continued.
"We don't know that," Lee said, and her hands came together in a spasm of fear. "Are you a doctor?"
"No; I'm only a newspaper man, but I've had a lot of experience with plagues of all sorts—both the yellow fever in Porto Rico and the typhoid in South Africa; that's why I'm out here prospecting over the hills. But who are you, may I ask? You look like the rose of Sharon."

"My name is Lee Wetherford," she answered, with childish directness, for there was something compelling in the man's voice and eyes. "And this is my mother." She indicated Lize, who was approaching.

"You are not out here for your health," he stated, rather thoughtfully. "How happens it you're here?"
"I was born here—in the fork."

"This face remained expressionless. 'I don't believe it. Can such hard work come out of Roaring Fork? No! But I don't mean that. What are you doing up here in this wilderness?'"

Lize took a part in the conversation. "Another inspector?" she asked as she lingered up.

"That's me," he replied. "Sherlock Holmes, Vidocq, all rolled into one." "My mother," again volunteered Lee. Hartley's eyes expressed incredulity, but he did not put his feelings into words, for he perceived in Lize a type with which he was entirely familiar, one to be handled with care. "What are you two women doing here? Are you related to one of these rangers?"

Lize resented this. "You're asking a good many questions, Mr. Man."

"That's my trade," was the unabashed reply, "and I'm not so old but that I can rise to a romantic situation."

"Thereupon he dropped all direct interrogation and with an air of candor told the story of his mission. Lize, entirely sympathetically, invited him to lunch, and he was soon in possession of their story, even to the tender relationship between Lee Virginia and the plague besieged forest ranger."

"We're not so mighty interested," he said, referring to his paper. "The 'Roaring' represents the new west in part, but to his new west means opportunity to look water sites and pile up unearned increments. Oh, yes, we're on the side of the fruit and alfalfa grower, because it pays. If the loss of my paper happened to be in the sheep business, as Senator Blank White is, we would sing a different tune, or if I were a congressman representing a district of cattlemen I'd be very slow about helping to build up any system that would make me pay for my grass. As it is, I'm committed to make it hot for the ranchers that killed those jagoes, and I'm going to do it. If this country had a man like Cavanagh for sheriff we'd have the murderers in two days. He knows who the butchers are, and I'd like his help. But he's nailed down here, and there's no hope of his getting away. A few men like him could civilize this country."

Thereupon he drew from three pairs of lips a statement of the kind of man Ross Cavanagh was, but none significant of all were the few words of the chief, to whom this man of the pad and pencil was a magician, capable of explaining a labyrinth, a baffling light and shadow by the mere motion of his hand. She liked him and grew more and more willing to communicate, and he, perceiving in her something unusual, lingered on, questioning. Then he rose. "I must be going," he said to Lee. "You've given me a lovely afternoon."

Lee Virginia was not too ignorant of the ways of reporters to resent his note taking, and she accepted his hand, believing him to be a sincere admirer of her ranger. "What are you going to do?" she asked.

"I'm going back to Sulphur to spread the report of Cavanagh's quarantine." Again that meaning smile. "I don't want any other newspaper men mixed up in my game. I'm Lonesome Ned in stinks like this, and I hope if they do come up you'll be judiciously silent. Goodby."

CHAPTER XXI WETHERFORD PASSES ON.
SOON after the reporter left Cavanagh called to Swenson: "The old man can't last through another such night as last night was, and I wish you would persuade Mrs. Wetherford and her daughter to return to the valley. They can do nothing here—absolutely nothing. Swenson repeated his commands with all the emphasis he could give them, but neither Lize nor Lee would consent to go. "It would be heathenish to leave him alone in this lonesome hole," protested Lize.

"I shall stay till he is free," added Lee, and with uneasy heart she crossed the bridge and walked on and on toward the cabin till she was close enough to detect the lines of care on her lover's haggard face.

"Stop!" he called sharply. "Keep away! Why don't you obey me? Why don't you go back to the valley?"

"Because I will not leave you alone—I can't! Please let me stay!"

"I beg of you, go back!"

The tone of the stream made it necessary to speak loudly, and he could not put into his voice the tenderness he felt at the moment, but his face was knotted with pain as he asked, "Don't you see you add to my loneliness, my pal?"

"I'm so anxious about you," she answered. "It seems as though we should be doing something to help you."

He understood and was grateful for the tenderness which brought her so near to him, but he was forced to be stern.

"There is nothing you can do—nothing more than you are doing. It helps me to know that you are here, but you must not cross the bridge. Please go back!"

There was pleading as well as command in his voice, and with a realization of the passion his voice conveyed she retraced her steps, her heart beating quickly with the joy which his words conveyed.

At sunset Redfield returned, bringing with him medicine, but no nurse. "No body will come up here," he said. "I reckon Ross is doomed to fight it out alone. The solitude, the long trail, scares the bravest of them away. I tried and tried—no use. Eleanor would have come, of course—demanded to come—but I would not permit that. She commissioned me to bring you both down to the ranch."

Lee Virginia thanked him, but reiterated her wish to stay until all possible danger to Cavanagh was over.

Redfield crossed the bridge and laid the medicines down outside the door. "The nurse from Sulphur refused to come when she found that her patient was in a mountain cabin. I'm sorry, old man. I did the best I could."

"Never mind," replied Cavanagh. "I'm still free from any touch of fever. I'm tired, of course, but good for another night of it. My main anxiety concerns Lize. Get her to go home with you if you can."

"I'll do the best I can," responded Redfield, "but meanwhile you must not think of getting out of the forest service. I have some cheering news for you. The president has put a good man into the chief's place."

Cavanagh's face brightened up. "That'll help some," he exclaimed. "But who's the man?"

Redfield named him. "He was a student under the chief, and the chief says he's all right, which satisfies me. Furthermore, he's a real forester and not a political jobber or a corporation attorney."

"That's good," repeated Cavanagh, "and yet," he said sadly, "it leaves the chief out just the same."

"No; the chief is not out. He's where he can fight for the idea to better advantage than when he was a subordinate under another man. Anyhow, he asks us all to line up for the work and not to mind him. The work, he says, is heavier than any man. Here's that resignation of yours," he said, taking Cavanagh's letter from his pocket. "I didn't put it in the What shall I do with it?"

"Throw it to me," said Cavanagh curtly.

Redfield tossed it over the biting pole, and Ross took it up, looked at it for a moment in silence, then tore it into bits and threw it on the ground.

"What are your orders, Mr. Supervisor?" he asked, with a faint, quizzical smile around his eyes.

"There's nothing you can do but take care of this man. But as soon as you are able to ride again I've got some special work for you. I want you to join with young Bingham, the ranger on Rock creek, and line up the Triangle cattle. Murphy is reported to have thrown on the forest nearly a thousand head more than his permit calls for. I want you to see about that. Then, complete your traps so that I can turn them in on the 1st of November and about the middle of December I'll send you a change of this forest in a second. Eleanor has decided to take the children abroad for a couple of years, and as I am to be over there part of the time I don't feel justified in looking down the supervisor's position. I shall resign in your favor. Wait now!" he called warningly. "The district forester and I framed all this up as we rode down the hill yesterday and it goes. Oh, yes, there's one thing more. Old man Dunn—"

"I know."

"How did you learn it?"

"A reporter came bounding over the ridge about noon today wanting me to give him the names which I had given you. I was strongly tempted to do as he asked me to, you know these newspaper men are sometimes the best kind of detectives for catching down criminals, but on second thought I concluded to wait until I had discussed the matter with you. I haven't much faith in the county authorities."

"Ordinarily I could have caught myself," replied Redfield, "but the whole country is roused, and we're going to round up these men this time sure. The best men and the big papers all over the west are demanding an exercise of the law, and the reward we have offered." He paused suddenly. "By the way, that reward will come to you if you can bring about the arrest of the criminals."

"The reward should go to Dunn's family," replied the ranger soberly. "Poor chap, he's sacrificed himself for the good of the state."

"That's true. His family is left in bad shape."

Cavanagh broke off the conversation suddenly. "I must go back now. I had almost forgot to tell you that."

"My patient needs a nurse," he declared. "How does he get on?"

"He's surely all right. In the meantime he can't get the right, but so long as he's conscious it's up to me to be on the spot."

Redfield walked slowly back to the river, thinking on the patient courage of the ranger.

"It isn't the obvious kind of thing, but it's courage all the same," he said to himself.

Meanwhile Lize and Virginia, left alone beside the fire, had drawn closer together.

The girl's face, so sweet and so sensitive, wrenched strongly upon the older woman's severely. Something of her own childhood came back to her. Being freed from the town and all its associations, she became more considerate, more thoughtful. She wished to speak, and yet she found it very hard to begin. At last she said, with a touch of mockery in her tone, "You like Ross Cavanagh almost as well as I do myself, don't you?"

The girl flushed a little, but her eyes remained steady. "I would not be here if I did not," she replied.

"Neither would I. Well, now, I have got something to tell you—something I ought to have told you long ago, something that Ross ought to know. I intended to tell you that first day you came back, but I couldn't somehow get to it, and I kept putting it off till—well, then I got fond of you, and every day made it harder. There she made her supreme effort. "Child, I'm an old maid. I'm not your mother at all."

Lee stared at her in amazement. "What do you mean?" she asked.

"I mean your real mother died when you was a tiny little babe. You see, I was your father's second wife. In fact, you weren't a year old when we married. Ed made me promise never to let you know. We were to bring you up just the same as if you was a child in both of us. Nobody knows but Reddy I told him the day we started up here."

The girl's mind ran swiftly over the past as she listened. The truth of the revelation reached her instantly, explaining a hundred strange things which had puzzled her all her life. The absence of deprecation between herself and Lize was explained. Their difference in habit, temperament, thought—all became plain. "But my mother," she said at last—"who was my mother?"

"I never saw her. You see, Ed came into the country, bringing you, a little, motherless babe. He always said your mother was a fine woman, but I never so much as saw a picture of her. She was an educated woman, he said—a southern woman and her name was Virginia, but that's about all I can tell you of her. Now I am going to let Ross know all of this as soon as I can. It will make a whole lot of difference in what he thinks of you."

She uttered all this much as a man would have done, with steady voice and with bright eyes, but Lee Virginia could feel beneath her harsh inflections the deep emotion which vibrated there, and her heart went out toward the lonely woman in a new rush of tenderness. Now that she was released from the necessity of excusing her mother's faults, faults she could now ignore—now that she could look upon her as a loyal friend, she was moved to pity and to love, and, rising, she went to her and put her arms about her neck and said, "This won't make any difference. I am going to stay with you and help you just the same."

The tears came to the old woman's eyes, and her voice broke as she replied. "I know you would say that, Lee Virginia, but all the same I don't

In the first place he has beaten you in the price of those 20 barrels he actually sold. The 20 barrels of fancy stock that he put into storage he will take out and sell for seven dollars per barrel. I guess not.

One Sunday in the fall of 1901 was up in this section and I saw a man and a couple of boys packing apples in an orchard. I noticed a long black thing which the man seemed to be using as a tool. I had never before seen a tool exactly like it in my experience in packing apples, and thinking it might be something new I stopped the horse and started to investigate. Now this is what I saw.

First he put about three pecks of nice Wagners in the barrel, double facing next the top. Then he picked up the long black thing, which was simply a cylinder of black sheet iron about two feet long and about 15 inches in diameter open at both ends, stood it up in the center of the barrel and filled it with a lot of worst, warmest little trash he could lay hands on. Then he filled around the outside of this cylinder and carefully pulled out the piece of iron filling in over the top with good apples and pressing the head into place. I asked what you are you trying to do with that kind of contrivance and he said "I'm getting even with that black commission man."

So great was my sympathy for weak men in the early years of my experience that I have made it a special study, and formulated two prescriptions, one for men under 50 and one for men over 50 years of age. In my declining years I want every man to have the benefit of my long years of careful study, research and long experience. I am now 73 years old and as strong and vigorous as at 40 and the rest of my life will be spent in doing suffering mankind realize that my time is short, but with all in my power to aid men and women who are helpless and seeking relief. I know there has been a great many disappointed when they thought they had found relief, but I am now and you my free prescription and booklet of private letters to men which is the result of study since I began lecturing in student classes, way back in '71. Since that time I have cured many cases that are now pleased to recommend me.

DR. ANDREW B. SPENCER,
10 W. Adams Ave., Detroit, Mich.

Now, I sympathized with that fellow. But he wasn't getting even with the commission man, he was just getting even with himself and the rest of us.

The commission man sold that barrel of apples as prime Michigan stock and the poor fellow who bought it and tried to use those awful apples said, "No more Michigan apples for me. Give me western stock hereafter."

These things I have mentioned are a few of the worth drawbacks which we have to contend with in the fruit business today. They are to enumerate:

- First—Crooked real estate work.
- Second—Crooked work in selling nursery stock.
- Third—Our own ignorance.
- Fourth—Transportation.
- Fifth—Inability to get for our fruit what we should.

All of these things can be avoided or remedied. Western Michigan comprises the most wonderful natural fruit belts in the whole United States. I have seen more money taken off an acre of fruit trees twice over than any of our millionaire lumbermen ever got in the state. The fellows who are making a success in the fruit growing business are the ones who know how to grow the fruit right.

Before we can hope to get much more out of the fruit business we must produce a much higher average grade of fruit; we must come to get better transportation facilities and lower rates; and to get our fruit out of the hands of the commission men, direct to the consumers. When we wake up and begin to do things the gold of the peach and the red of the apple will replace on those hills, the rainbow colors of the autumn leaves and five and ten dollar bills will replace the dimes and dimes in our pockets.

Now you are changing your insurance before placing your risks, Myrtle Young.

A Puzzled Waiter.

An irate guest at a Chestnut street restaurant called the waiter to him and protested in no quiet tones.

"Waiter," he roared, "there's a fly in this soup!"

"Yes—yes, sir," agreed the waiter.

"Remove it immediately," the man directed, still furious.

"Ye—yes, sir. The fly, sir?" the waiter suggested loudly, and the man glared at him for a moment in unspeakable wrath.

At last when he found his voice again he spluttered forth:

"Idiot! No! Remove the soup!"

And the waiter as he bent over to take the plate away murmured patiently: "Ye—yes, sir. And shall I leave the fly, sir?"—Philadelphia Times.

The last number of the lecture course, "The Music Makers," was greeted by a packed house last Friday evening. The Marimbaphone proved to be a unique, melodious instrument and was artistically played by the members of the quartette of young men, who justly enthused the audience and proved their claim of being "musical to their finger tips." The singing numbers and piano solos were rendered by the individual members of the company. One reading was given which was received with varied applause. The quartette rendered songs of classical and humorous nature and carried out the character suggestions in A-1 style.

Congratulations are heartily extended to the course committee for its successful series of entertainments this year. Next year's course will be composed of two musical numbers, two lectures and one impersonation. Among the lecturers will be Judge Alden, who enthused the audience this season to the highest pitch.

Neighborhood Notes

The election of P. H. O'Brien as judge of the Houghton circuit is evidently satisfactory to most of the people of the upper country and has not caused the soreness that was anticipated. The tenor of the statement made by the winner on the night of the election is a fair ring. He said: "On the face of the returns I am elected by a handsome majority. I am simply saying that I am grateful to the people of the twelfth judicial circuit for their endorsement of my candidacy. As I have stated during my campaign, I may reiterate, I will exert my best efforts in the discharge of my duties of the high office of circuit judge in such a fair and impartial manner as to merit the confidence reposed in me by the voters. I take this opportunity to heartily thank my friends throughout the county for their spirited work in my behalf. It is just and fair to my opponent to say that he conducted a clean campaign against me, of which I am most deeply appreciative. I am sure I have the support and co-operation of the bar of the circuit to assist in securing administration of impartial justice to all." Mr. McDonald, for his part, was a graceful loser. His comment on the results was as follows: "In the words of the immortal DeWitt Hopper 'we have met the enemy and he is ours.' The people have decided and I give them my full assent to their verdict. The strongest and best man won. I will give the new circuit judge my heartiest and best assistance as a member of the Houghton county bar. Already I have extended my congratulations to Mr. O'Brien.

Arthur Brock, a former Alma young man, who is superintendent of a cattle ranch owned by a Chicago firm near Paria, Mexico, was partially wounded a short time ago. He is now recovering from a bullet wound in the shoulder. He was attacked by the men who are believed to be a part of a lawless band under the standard of the insurrection, as he was riding on an isolated part of the ranch. In a running fight on his back, which lasted for five miles, he shot and killed two of the men and finally outdistanced his pursuers and reached the ranch house, where he was wounded. He gives a graphic description of the fight in a letter to a relative in Alma.

The large residence built by Col. E. S. Dickinson upwards of 30 years ago at Sallins, and occupied by James Conits burned to the ground last week. The fire was discovered about 4:30 and the planning mill whistle sounded the alarm bringing the town to the rescue. Part of Mr. Conits' furniture was saved and all of Mr. Stone's, who lived in the sixth part of the house. The Colonial built the house in the summer of 1873 of the best white pine lumber and it could not be duplicated today for less than $30,000. Furniture and house was insured for $14,000.

A check for $8.00 was presented last week at the First National bank for payment that was at once stamped as a forgery by the official of the bank and the chief of police is now on the lookout for the maker of the check.

The check was given on the People's bank and was made out to, and endorsed by Hiram L. Swift, Mr. Smith the cashier of the bank says the writing is a very good imitation of Hiram L. Swift's but the forger was not as well posted on the first name as he should have been to make the check pass well in Boyne City.

It was paid first by Joe Beltruska, then Lee Howard and was finally taken in payment for good at the store of J. P. Planders, Boyne City Journal.

Orchard and Garden.

Those who argue that fruit is unprofitable and that the orchard is seldom profitable do not give an estimate of the work given their trees. It may be that their orchards do not get much attention, which, of course, explains why they are unprofitable.

Permanent labels for trees and shrubs may be made from zinc cut into strips. If the name is written on the zinc with an ordinary lead pencil it will prove indelible and will not be affected by the elements.

It is a good idea to plan now for an evergreen windbreak to protect your orchard, but do not set the trees now; wait until spring.

Store the ladders under cover, but give them a good coat of paint first.

Good garden implements are essential for successful gardening. Much of the benefit and pleasure derived from work in the garden is missed by having poor tools. Spend part of the winter leisure in getting the tools in shape.

Prepare the soil for your bedding plants which are to be planted next spring. You cannot take too much pains in preparing the soil.

If you have decided to diversify your crops carry out the idea by planting several kinds of fruits. The garden, too, should show a nice variety. You may specialize if you wish, but be sure to have something else besides your specialty.

Get busy with the saw and pruning shears and clean out every dead and rankered branch.

SICK PEOPLE SHOULD INVESTIGATE

I Know the Diseases of Both Sexes Like an Open Book. I have Been Curing Them for 47 Years. In fact, My Entire Life Has Been Devoted to Curing Where Others Have Failed.

I Have Changed Hundreds Upon Hundreds of Nervous Wrecks Into Fine, Strong Men and Women. I Accept No Case I Cannot Cure.

ESPECIALLY those all discouraged and dissatisfied ones who have been treated on a cure for a fully and frankly about their case. It will cost you nothing to write me, and I will gladly tell you your condition, truthfully, honestly—accepting the case that I come, safe—holding out no false promises. I have spent my whole life in the study and cure of chronic diseases, and my study and investigation have led me to the discovery of many new and marvelous methods of treating disease. I have cured many cases of chronic diseases, such as: Rheumatism, Gout, Gravel, Catarrh of the Bladder, Neuritis, Sciatica, Palsy, Paralysis, Epilepsy, St. Vitus Dance, Paralysis, etc., and many other cases of chronic diseases. LIME USED AS A FERTILIZER

Summary of Papers Read Before National Convention

OF LIME MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

Held at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania Last Winter

Standard Cement & Lime Company are Unable to Supply the Demand, Nearly All Kings of Soil Require Lime.

The Standard Cement & Lime Co. are pushing the manufacture of hydrated lime actively with a large force of men and will begin pushing the other part of the work as soon as the ground settles. One important product they are turning out, and are unable to supply the demand for, is lime for fertilizing purposes. The value of this product of the company, and of lime generally for building up land was ably set forth by Prof. Feltz at the national convention of lime manufacturers, this winter.

"It is easy to handle, having no offensive properties. In the form of hydrate it may be sired indefinitely."

Mr. Warner a large manufacturer, summed up the matter of adding lime to the soil as follows:

1. In general, modern agricultural lines are much purer than those of a generation ago. Accordingly their action is much more intense. Smaller quantities must be used and carelessness on the part of the user may harm the soil.

2. Ground lime and hydrated lime must be used in very much smaller quantities than other forms on account of the fact that a more intimate mixture between the soil humus and active lime is obtained with them, than with the older form of run of kiln and air-slacked lime.

3. The practice of drilling hydrated lime with clover seed has been found successful, but must be done with great care and only under the advice of an experimental station.

4. Ground limestone is "food-proof." It can be applied to a soil in any desired quantity within reason, so as to suffice for many years, without in any way injuring the soil. It leaches out but very slowly. The limestone should be ground so that it will pass a 12 mesh screen and at least 50 per cent should pass 100 mesh.

5. Quick lime, hydrated lime and ground limestone, all have the same ultimate effects. Their respective total values are based upon the available oxide of lime and magnesia present. In good grades of materials these available oxides should run in excess of the following: Ground lime 88 per cent, hydrated 78 per cent, ground limestone 17 per cent.

6. Lime or ground limestone can to advantage, be spread upon the field any time during the winter on frozen ground. This is particularly desirable on level ground. On rolling or hilly country there is danger of the material being lost through surface washing unless the ground is protected by a cover crop. Ground limestone is less susceptible to surface washing and hydrate lime most susceptible until it gets thoroughly wet and incorporates with the soil.

7. Many chemical tests are proposed for the determination of whether the soil does or does not need lime. These tests require special materials and a certain technical knowledge, and it is to be preferred, therefore, that a farmer should determine the requirements of the soil by its history and appearance. If the soil has been richly supplied with manure and fertilizer and cropped regularly for several years, then it is certainly in need of lime, even though it should be overlying limestone. If the soil refuses to give a good crop of clover, and is inclined to grow weeds, such as sorrel, etc., then lime is quickly needed.

PLAN FOR CAMPAIGN

Local Option Forces Lining Up For Next Spring

Will Battle in Forty Counties, Taking in All Wet Territory North of Muskegon.

See-saw prohibition is still the program in Michigan. Already the Anti-saloon league has begun planning for the campaign for various counties for the spring of 1912.

State Superintendent G. W. Morrow announces that lights probably be waged in fourteen wet counties. Nearly thirty dry counties will be eligible for contests on the part of the license forces. This makes a total of over forty counties open to contests next year, including such cities as Cadillac, Traverse City, Manistee, Ludington and Big Rapids. Supt. Morrow said:

"Drawing a line west from Saginaw bay to Muskegon, we shall invade all the wet counties to the north that are subject to the opening of the issue next spring. These include Mecosta, Lake, Mason, Manistee, Wexford, Grand Traverse, Leelanau, Rosecommon and Crawford counties.

"Further south we expect lights in Ottawa, Berrien, Washtenaw, Oakland and St. Clair counties with the cities of St. Joseph, Benton Harbor, Ann Arbor, Ypsilanti and Pontiac included.

"Hence county which is dry, desires more dry territory close by. Our people in Grand Traverse and Leelanau counties have agreed to campaign together next April."

Cadillac is bound to continue a strong center. A letter just received by Superintendent Morrow from Perry R. Pagers puts the case strongly up to former Mayor Gallney again in the following language:

"The vote here last week is a complete vindication of our position and supports the contention that 400 voters were polarized here a year ago. Gallney was defeated here at the last election by more than one hundred majority, but the total vote was 1,161 as against 1,890 one year ago. It was the largest vote ever cast in Cadillac except in 1908 and 1910 when the saloon question was to the front. It is significant that this year there is a loss of 429 in the total vote. We have said that the vote artificially increased their vote a year ago by about four hundred."

For the first time in Michigan the Anti-saloon league officials say they have proof that brewers are furnishing money for the circulation of published attacks made on the league by certain free-lance prohibitionists.

The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the eight months, August to March, is 820,000 and the amount of wheat yet remaining in the possession of growers, after deducting 2,000,000 bushels used for seed and home consumption is 5,000,000 bushels.

Fifty-seven mills, elevators report no wheat marketed in March.

The average condition of rye is 91 in the state and northern counties, 91 in the southern counties, 88 in the central counties, and 97 in the upper peninsula.

WILLIAM C. GRANDY

Dies at His Home in Hayes Township

Had Spent an Active Life Was a Veteran of the Civil War.

W. C. Grandy, one of Hayes' most prominent residents, died at his home in that township Monday night.

Mr. Grandy was born in Wayne county, N. Y., June 21, 1842. Upon the death of his father, in 1856, he went to Chicago where he made his home with a married sister and learned the trade of carpenter and millwright with his brother-in-law, afterward going into the contracting business, working at that profession three years in Oshtemo.

In 1856 he came to Kalkaska and followed his profession there for seven years. The next three years he kept a boarding house in Fife Lake. Having taken many contracts in this county he moved here in 1860 and settled on his farm on Pine Lake, where he built up an elegant home. He retired from his profession of contracting in 1900.

Mr. Grandy was married in 1861 Jane McKim in Wayne county, N. Y. and leaves two children, Claude H. and Mrs. Roy Kane, both of Hayes.

Mr. Grandy enlisted in the 18th N. Y. Infantry in 1862 and was afterward transferred to the 9th N. Y. heavy artillery, serving until the close of the war.

MUCH DAMAGE BY STORM

At Walloon Lake and Vicinity Friday and Saturday.

Walloon Lake experienced a severe southwest storm Friday and Saturday, the foot of the lake suffering a great deal from its force. A large number of new docks were built last winter, and most of these are ruins, while the new dock built by Clyde Bear, which the Steamer Tourist was to use the approaching summer, is practically a wreck.

The bathing chute and dock have been torn to pieces by the wind and ice and a number of structures which did not suffer Friday are now in grave danger from the broken ice.

The steamer Tourist has not been damaged much, though the new rudder has been broken and a hole was made in the stern. Ice has been packed on the shore, in some places as high as the eaves of private boat houses. A fine new dock, fifty feet long, just completed Saturday by Mr. Campbell, proprietor of Lakeside hotel, is practically a ruin, while the Indian Garden landing and, in fact, nearly all the hotel docks, have suffered a great deal.

Friday witnessed considerable destruction near the head of the lake, Lake Grove dock having several spiles torn out, while Baer's Den was in much the same condition, men being now constantly at work at the latter place to keep the ice off. Though the wind was worse Friday than Saturday, the danger from breaking ice was not so great.

DON'T EXPERIMENT

You Will Make no Mistake if You Follow This Advice.

Never neglect your kidneys. If you have pain in the back, urinary disorders, dizziness and nervousness, it is time to act not to experiment. These are all symptoms of kidney trouble, and you should seek a remedy that is known to cure the kidneys.

Doan's Kidney Pills is the remedy to use. No need to experiment. It has cured many stubborn cases in this vicinity.

Can Charlevoix residents demand further proof than that contained in the following testimonial?

George Holbrook, Main and Danforth Sts., Mancelma, Mich., says: "Doan's Kidney Pills helped me wonderfully. I had an extremely lame back and there were gentle pains in my limbs when I stopped or lifted. My kidneys also bothered me considerably. After using Doan's Kidney Pills, the lameness left my back and the kidney secretions became regular in passage. Since then I have been free from kidney disorders and consequently, I have no hesitation in giving Doan's Kidney Pills my endorsement."

Cavanagh, Forest Ranger

The Great Conservation Novel

By HAMLIN GARLAND

Copyright, 1910, by Hamlin Garland

CHAPTER XXII.
OUT OF QUARANTINE INTO HEAVEN.
WHEN Cavanagh awoke it was noon, and Swenson, the guard, was standing over him. "I'm sorry, but it's time to be moving," he said. "It's a long ride over there."

"What time is it?" inquired Cavanagh, with some bewilderment. "Nearly noon. I've got some coffee ready. Want some?" "Do I? Just watch me!" And he scrambled out of his bed with vigor and stretched himself like a cat. "Wow, but it does feel good to know that I am out of jail!"

Going down to the stream, he splashed his face and neck in the clear cold water, and the brisk rubbing which followed seemed to clear his thoughts as well as sharpen his appetite. "You seem all right so far," hazarded the guard.

"I am all right, and I'll be all right tomorrow, if that's what you mean," replied Cavanagh. "Well, now, pack up, and we'll pull out."

For a few moments after he mounted his horse Cavanagh looked about the place as if for the last time, now up at the hill, now down at the meadow and last of all at the stream. "I hope you'll enjoy this station as much as I have, Swenson. It's one of the prettiest on the whole forest."

Together they zigzagged up the side of the hill to the north, and then, with Cavanagh in the lead, followed by his pack horse, they set up the long lateral moraine which led by a wide circle through the wooded park toward the pass. The weather was clear and cold. The wind bit, and Cavanagh, smartly clothed as he was, drew his robe close about his neck, saying: "I know now how it feels to be a blanket Indian. I must say I prefer an overcoat."

A little later the keen eyes of the guard, sweeping the mountain side, were suddenly arrested. "There's a bunch of cowboys coming over the pass," he called.

"What makes you think that?" "Because he was crazy to return to the show with which he used to perform and desperately in need of money. Have you thought that Gregg might have had a hand in this affair?"

Dunn said he had, although he was not present at any of the meetings. "This seemed to surprise the attorney very much. 'But he's a sheepman!' he exclaimed. 'I know he is. But he's also a sheep partner in the Threemile cattle outfit and is making a lot of trouble. And besides, he had it in for those dogboys, as he calls them, because they were sleeping territory' which he wanted himself."

"I don't think he's any too good for it," responded Simpson, "but I doubt if he had any hand in the killing. He's too cunning and too cowardly. But I'll keep in mind what you have said, and if he is involved in any degree he'll have to go down the road with the others. His money can't save him."

As they came back to the party Cavanagh thought he detected in Gregg's eyes a shifting light that was not there before, but he made no further attempt to suppress his opinion upon the attorney or the sheriff. He only said: "Well, now, gentlemen, I must go on over the divide. I have an appointment with the doctor over there, also with a hotel and a warmer suit of clothes than I have on. If I can be of any service to you when I am out of quarantine I hope you will call upon me."

"It is possible that we may need you in order to locate some of the men whose names you have given me," "Very good," replied Cavanagh. "If they come upon the forest anywhere, the supervisor and I will find them for you."

So they parted, and Cavanagh and his guard resumed their journey across the range.

CONCLUSION
In her career as the wife of a western rancher Eleanor Redfield had been called upon to entertain many strange guests, and she made no very determined objection when her husband telephoned that he was bringing Lee as well as Lee's Virginia to stay at Elk Lodge for a few days. The revelation of the true relation between the two women had as Lee put it made a "whole lot of difference" to Mrs. Redfield, and naturally cleared the daughter of some part of her handicap, and it had also made the mother's attitude less objectionable.

In with these surroundings, that she was at home with shining silver and dainty dishes, and she said to herself: "I could have been something like her if I'd had any sort of raising, but it's too late now. But, Lord, wouldn't I like to see her now!"

It was not yet dark when they came out on the veranda to meet the doctor, who had come to meet Ross, and Lee's anxiety led her to say: "Can't you go up to the cabin and wait for him there?"

"I was about to propose that," replied Redfield. "Shall we wait?" Lee was impatient in her desire to be off, but Lee said: "I never was much on foot, and now I'm hoofed. You go along, and I'll sit on the porch legs and wait."

So Lee, the doctor and Redfield went off together across the meadow, toward the little cabin which had been built for the workmen while putting in the dam. It was hardly a mile away, and yet it stood at the mouth of a mighty gorge, out of which the water sprang white with speed.

But Lee had no mind for the scene, or, though her eyes were lifted to the meadow's wall, down which the ranger was expected to ride. It looked frightfully steep, and whenever she thought of him descending that trail, worn and perhaps ill, her heart ached with anxiety. But Redfield rambled on comfortably, explaining the situation to the doctor, who, being a most unimaginative person, appeared to take it all as a matter of course.

At the cabin itself Lee transferred her interest to the supper which had been prepared for the ranger, and she went about the room trying to make it a little more comfortable for him. It was a bare little place, hardly more than a camp, and was proper, and she devoutly prayed that he was not to be sick, though, for it smelt a good and cozy place, close under the shadow of a great wall of rock.

As if aware that she flung a lamp and placed it outside the window in order that the light might catch the ranger's eye, and encouraged it did, for almost instantly a light shot down from the hillside far above signaling his approach.

"There he is!" she exclaimed, in swift rebound to ecstasy. "Hear him shout?" This voice could indeed be heard, though faintly, and so they waited while the darkness deepened and the voice of the stream rose like an exhalation, increasing in volume as the night fell.

ALFALFA

By Milton M. Burnham.

Much of the soil of western Michigan is, when first cleared, and after years of cropping, well fitted, essentially, for production of profitable crops of alfalfa. This is true of all the dry and high land except a few spots of cold clay or places where there may be seepage. It will not prosper on soil constantly wet nor where the "water table" is within three feet of the surface. Such moist places are the natural home of Alsike and Mammoth clover and alfalfa seed should not be wasted on them. If alfalfa reaches water during the first year its life is not likely to suffer for water after that. If sown about June 1st, it will, in loose soil, be down about four feet at the coming on of winter if conditions are favorable; and it will continue to descend until it is satisfied with its water supply.

At least we have the statement of the United States officials that they found in Nevada a root 120 feet in length which had descended through soil and rock crevices.

It should be assumed as a fact that alfalfa is not equipped when young, for a contest with other plants for the possession of the soil.

FOR AGED PEOPLE

Old Folks Should be Cared in Their Selection of Regulative Medicine.

We have a safe, dependable and altogether ideal remedy that is particularly adapted to the requirements of aged people and persons of weak constitution who suffer from constipation or other bowel disorders. We are so certain that it will relieve these complaints and give absolute satisfaction in every particular, that we offer it without personal guarantee that it will not do the user nothing if it fails to substantiate our claims. This remedy is called Rexall's Cathartics.

Rexall's Cathartics have a soothing, healing, strengthening tonic and regulative action upon the bowels. They remove all irritation, dryness, soreness and weakness. They restore the bowels and associated organs to normal vigorous and healthy activity. They are eaten like candy, may be taken at any time without inconvenience, do not cause any griping, nausea, diarrhoea, excessive looseness, flatulence or other disagreeable effects. Price 25c and 50c. Sold only at our store, "The Rexall Store"—The Ivy Drug Store, E. N. Mitchell, proprietor.

and it should be understood that with the soil entirely clear of other seeds alfalfa, sown in our soils still have serious conditions to contend with. In its first growth, during its first few days as a plant, it must needs have a sufficient quantity of moisture, to obtain which it has to contend with the re-established demands of the soil, with the absorbing rays of the sun and with the ever continued work of the hot winds or summer. If we consider the sun and winds as only auxiliaries of the soil in robbing the alfalfa seed of its needed moisture, this in no wise lessens the serious nature and strength of the contest.

Remember that, during rain, moisture, near the surface of the soil, can only be induced and held by very thorough and very wise cultivations. The land, if plowed and, should be plowed in the fall; should be cultivated thoroughly several times in the spring, and certainly as often as weeds or grasses start into growth. It will pay well to roll the ground several times before seeding, and the ground should be well packed.

I do not believe it is necessary to lime all soils for alfalfa, but as ground, unburned lime, the right sort, can be obtained for two dollars a ton it may be advisable to use it. The ideal one ton to the acre is advised, and for best results it should be applied one year before the seeding.

Next week "Alfalfa Seeding."

REFORM.

Reform, like charity, must begin at home. Once well at home, how it will radiate outward, irrefragable, into all that we touch and handle, speak and work, kindling ever new light by measurable contagion, spreading far and wide, doing good only wherever it spreads and not evil.

Do you kick? When it's at laying eggs for the season, a lot of people kick that they have been neglected to the season of the egg.

You have been neglected by the dealer and can only get a poor quality of eggs. Note by the following list the difference in weight of a dozen eggs from various sources.

Light to light, to eight ounces; Black Major, twenty-seven ounces; Barred Rock, twenty-six ounces; Langshan, twenty-six ounces; White Wyandotte, twenty-four ounces; Buff Cochins, twenty-four ounces; S. C. White Leghorns, twenty-three ounces; S. C. Brown Leghorns, twenty-two ounces; Hamburg, twenty-one ounces.

You pay the same for twelve Hamburg eggs weighing twenty-one ounces as for twelve Brahmas weighing twenty-eight ounces.

A dozen Hamburg pullet eggs weighing seventeen ounces are on a par with a dozen Minorca hen's eggs that weigh twenty-seven ounces.

You get better by pound and milk by quart, but for eggs there is no standard. Sales is just a word and many little things count. But you are not the only loser.

The hen that produces big eggs loses.

They cost more to produce than small ones and yet must be sold for the same money.

To lay in November Brahmas must be hatched in March; Bantams and Rocks in April; White Leghorns and Hamburgs in May, June or July.

Those Brahmas that lay the heaviest eggs must be fed from two to four months longer than Hamburgs before they lay as pullets, but their eggs sell the same.

A Brahma eats ten pounds of grain a year, weighs thirty pounds, Leghorns or Hamburgs six pounds, yet their eggs sell the same.

Harmony Grange No. 1451.

Harmony Grange held another successful meeting on their regular meeting night and the contest between opposing sides was spirited. Miss Lettler's side retaining the lead gained at the previous meeting and gaining ten points more. One of the special features which tends towards the good of the order is the learning and repeating of the obligation and other parts of the manual. The secretary read some very interesting communications from George B. Norton, calling attention to some new opportunities for financial benefit to be derived from grange membership, which had been arranged for by the state grange committee. Special attention should be given to the bulletin to be issued by the committee containing a list of things wanted and for sale by the members thus assisting in bringing the buyer and seller together. Harmony grange endorsed the plan and ordered two copies of the bulletin, one for the secretary and one for the chairman of the trade committee.

Girlhood of Frances Willard.

(Continued from last week.) There were good times on the long winter evenings, when the dear mother, who had taught school and attended college, had acted as their school teacher in the pleasant "evening school." They learned to love study, and to read the best books. They early tried to put their thoughts in writing, and

How to Tell if Your Hair is Diseased

Even if you have a luxuriant head of hair you may want to know whether it is in a healthy condition or not. 98 per cent of the people need a hair tonic.

Pull a hair out at your head. If the bulb at the end of the root is white and shrunken, it proves that the hair is diseased, and requires prompt treatment if its loss would be avoided. If the bulb is pink and full, the hair is healthy.

We want everyone whose hair requires treatment to try Rexall "33" Hair Tonic. We promise that it shall not cost anything if it does not give satisfactory results. It is designed to overcome dandruff, relieve scalp irritation, to stimulate the hair roots, tighten the hair already in the head, grow hair and cure baldness.

often composed little essays and even verses.

When Frances was twelve, and schooldays began in the little district schoolhouse. When she was seventeen she went to Milwaukee, and became a student in the Milwaukee female college. In the spring of 1858 when Frances was in her 19th year, the family moved to Evanston, Ill., where the two farmer's daughters entered the Woman's college.

The story of Frances E. Willard after that is the story of a great teacher and a great leader. She was well trained and she began by training others. From teaching a little district school on the Illinois prairie, she rose in a few years to the "Dean" or head of the Woman's college in Evanston, of which she was a graduate. The great work on her life, however, was that of a public leader and reformer.

When Frances was a girl of sixteen she cut a temperance pledge from a children's paper, pasted it in the family bible, and insisted upon its being signed by every member of the family, father, mother, brother and sister and self.

Looking back the fifty years since that incident seems prophetic. For in 1874 Miss Willard resigned as dean of the Woman's college in Evanston and entered upon the temperance work which was the great work of her life. That year she became president of the Chicago Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Later she became state president, and national secretary. In 1879 she was made president of the National W. C. T. U. Four years later she founded and became president of the World's W. C. T. U., now established in more than fifty countries.

For nineteen years Miss Willard was the organizer and leader of the greatest temperance movement the world has ever known. She also worked for woman suffrage and the equal rights of women and men. And when her work ended in 1898, she was one of the most loved and honored women of her time.

One notable tribute has been paid to the memory of this famous woman, who sixty years ago was an unknown girl in a Wisconsin farmhouse. In the capitol at Washington is the national hall of statuary, in which each state may place two statues of distinguished citizens. The state of Illinois has placed in this hall a marble statue of Frances E. Willard. It is the only statue of a woman in the gallery, and it stands by the side of the statue of George Washington, Jane A. Stewart in Little Folks.

LOOK OUT FOR APPLE SCAB.

One of the Most Destructive Diseases. Passes Winter on Leaves and Fruit.

According to a circular issued by the Virginia agricultural experiment station, scab is one of the most common and destructive diseases of apples and pears. A very similar disease affects quinces. It passes the winter season on leaves and diseased fruit, attacking the young foliage, bloom and fruit very early in the growing season. The fall crop is browned and blighted by the disease. At first attacked at the stage drops or falls to develop. Later there is a secondary attack on the fruit.

grown fruit, which disfigures it with gray and black blotches and "freckles" to such an extent that it renders the fruit unsalable. Spraying with Bordeaux or lime sulphur (summer strength) before the bloom opens, supplemented by one or two later treatments at intervals of from ten days to two weeks, will prevent the development of this disease. The winter wash of lime sulphur if applied for scale just before buds begin to swell adds the further treatment very materially.

Winter Feeding of Teams.

How to feed the team most economically, especially when there is no work for them, is a good deal of a problem. If there is any place where wheat or oat straw can be economically fed it is to this team to supply a part of the filling and filler. This, with well made clover hay and corn or timothy hay and oats, will keep them in good condition and maintain their muscles. It has been found economical to have the grain finely ground for horses over twelve and under five years of age. The teeth of young and old horses will not usually allow them to thoroughly masticate whole grain; hence there is a loss either of grain or flesh or both. Farm and Poultry.

Protection For the Farmhouse.

A hedgehog of cinders or spunk trees along the windward side of the driveway leading from the main road to the farmhouse offers a warmth of welcome in winter that cannot be obtained in any other way. A stock proof fence that is both useful and ornamental can be made by setting fenceposts near the eaves and stretching barbed wire in the usual way. Farm Press.

The Hum of the Hive.

Any bee which loses sight of the spirit of the hive and works only for private good is considered sick, criminally insane, and the community no longer allows him to take up good space. Ellen Hubbard.

Honey will rarely or become white and hard during cold weather. This is really a good test of purity, for while all pure honey does not curdle, yet all honey curdled solid is pure.

An excellent grade of beeswax can be extracted from seemingly black and worthless combs. The market price of wax averages about 25 or 30 cents a pound. Beekeepers too often overlook the possible income from wax.

If you use modern movable frame hives the stored honey should be equalized among your colonies. That in frames of sealed honey should be exchanged for frames of empty comb from the light colonies.

A strong hive contains 10,000 bees in February, 15,000 in March, 30,000 in April and from 50,000 to 80,000 in May.

The bee is charged with various functions. Its sting is formidable, but chiefly to the robber. It is devoid of ravine fruit, but its tongue is formed exclusively for the extraction of sweet juices, and its mandibles are unable to pierce the skin of fruit.

In New York state it is not considered safe to winter bees in single wall hives out of doors without protection.

Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a running sound or imperfect hearing and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are cured by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surface.

Bills Were Passed by the Recent Legislature

OVER THOUSAND WERE INTRODUCED

Session was the Shortest Ever Held in Michigan

Much Good Work was Done Although Considerable Time was Taken up in Quarreling.

In spite of the fact that this session of the legislature was the most prolific in the number of general bills introduced, the total of measures passed and sent to the governor for approval is not so much greater than that two years ago.

The total number of bills introduced this session was 1,655, more than ever before, even in the days of local measures. Of this total 927 were introduced in the house and 428 in the senate. That the legislature was able to distinguish necessary bills and was not swayed by mere force of numbers is indicated by the fact that the total number of bills passed and sent to the governor was 333. The house bills passed numbered 198 and the number of senate bills that will become laws unless the governor exercises his veto power on them was 145. In addition there are eighty-one senate resolutions passed and the house passed 123 resolutions.

Any unbiased authority who looks over the work today and gives it careful consideration will be ready to assert that the legislature has done a lot of good work. It has done it with facility and in spite of internal disruption that would have obviated success in almost any parliamentary body. Following is a resume of the important measures that have been agreed to:

ARBOR DAY PROCLAMATION

By legislative enactment the governor is authorized to set apart one day in the year, to be known as Arbor and Bird Day. The importance of the proper observance of an Arbor Day is becoming more apparent every year. The problem of conservation of our natural resources is one of national proportions, and faithful remembrance of the day is furnishing the people of our commonwealth with a clearer understanding of the economic value of forest and bird preservation.

While the purpose of the day is to stimulate the pride and interest of the people, the state should also be concerned in the adoption of a far-sighted policy of conservation and reforestation, thereby creating value as well as adding comfort and beauty for the present and future generations.

For the first time in the history of Michigan the governor is requested by senate resolution (No. 35, introduced by Senator L. Whitney Watkins) to call attention to the importance of protecting and encouraging song and insectivorous birds, not only for their economic but for their aesthetic value. This is a commendable action. It is desirable to teach an intelligent appreciation of the pleasures and benefits to be derived from birds. Almost all birds do more good than harm. The balance of the value is clearly in favor of even all the hawks, except two. It is much better to let a harmful bird escape than run the risk of killing a bird of value. Great care should be exercised that birds are not killed or molested in their nesting places. A person who will put up bird boxes and otherwise take an interest in our feathered friends will be well repaid. Every farmer should be a bird guardian. To be interested in and kind to birds is a sign of gentleness and makes one better.

Tree planting on private and public grounds is recommended, and it is requested that all public schools and places of learning throughout the state will hold appropriate exercises to call attention to the importance of saving our birds and trees. Especial attention is called to the forest-fire laws. Campers should exercise care in selecting a place for a fire and should extinguish it before leaving. Nor should trees and shrubs be needlessly marred by hacking with an axe or otherwise.

Therefore, I, Chase S. Osborn, governor of the commonwealth of Michigan, do hereby issue this my proclamation, designating May 1, 1911, Arbor and Bird Day throughout the commonwealth and earnestly urge its observance.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the state this 31st day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eleven, and of the commonwealth, the seventy-fifth.

FREDERICK C. MARTINDALE, Secretary of State.

CHASE S. OSBORN, Governor.

APPLES SOLD WELL

Frank Smith Received Ten Dollars Per Barrel

They Were the Last of His Crop and Were Exhibited at State Grange.

Ten dollars per barrel seems like a large price to pay for a barrel of apples but that is the amount that the Hannah & Lay Mercantile company paid Frank Smith of the peninsula for a barrel consisting of Canada Red, Fallwater and Waggoners, which apples were the last of his 1909 crop. The apples are a part of those that were exhibited during the state grange and created such favorable comment from the visitors from all parts of the country.

The apples are all splendid specimens and are far superior in appearance to the western apples, and are a good sample of what kind of fruit can be grown in the Grand Traverse region. These apples were grown in the orchard of Mr. Smith which sold for $2,000 last fall when scarcely anyone else had any apples for sale, and this crop was the result of careful culture and spraying which was carried out during the spring and summer seasons.

After the apples were purchased they were placed on sale in the grocery department at the rate of three for ten cents which does not leave a very large margin of profit for the store, as there were exactly 360 apples in the barrel by actual count.

The presence of these apples in the market at this time of the year goes to show what can be done in the line of fruit culture when it is conducted along scientific lines. As this is well along in April it is excellent proof of the keeping qualities of the Grand Traverse product, which is always in condition to be placed on the market after other apples have passed out of season.

EIGHTH GRADE EXAMINATION

Will be Held May 4 and 5, Note Change in Tuition Law.

The annual grade examination will be held on Thursday and Friday, May 4 and 5, beginning at 8:30 a. m. standard time.

The examination in reading will be based on "Evangeline." Applicants will bring Legal Cap paper and pen or pencil.

The examination will be conducted in the high school buildings in the following named places: Charlevoix, Boyne City, East Jordan and St. James.

Rural pupils may select the most convenient place or if more convenient may attend elsewhere and have their papers forwarded to me, provided the examiner at such other place does not refuse to forward papers.

The recent legislature amended the tuition law making it necessary that a pupil shall be the holder of an eighth grade diploma in order to have his tuition paid by the district. (This does not apply to ninth graders who had their tuition paid last year.)

This makes the examination an important factor to any one from the rural districts who may wish to attend high school.

The examination will be made as practical as possible and will be fair and free from puzzles.

An average of 70 per cent will be required for a diploma.

Teachers will please see to it that all prospective high school pupils understand the importance of this examination and urge them to attend.

Each applicant will bring a certificate from his teacher stating the length of time that he has pursued the studies of the eighth grade.

WILL SOON BE HERE

New Steamer City of Boyne, Formerly Lou A. Cummings.

A Marquette dispatch says: The former little steamer, but now the big steamer Lou A. Cummings, was launched from the ways of the Marquette Iron Works ship yards, where she has been undergoing repairs, which took all winter. The steamer, besides being lengthened has been entirely rebuilt from stem to stern and is a handsome looking boat in the water with her white hull and green water lines. She is practically a new boat as her owners have spared no expense. In addition to the improvement already made, she will also have a new boiler and engine, which will add greatly to her speed.

After her new inspection she will be renamed the "City of Boyne" which will be in honor of the citizens of the city she is named after. Captain Weaver has been here all winter superintending the work of reconstruction. As soon as the new boiler and engine are installed the boat is completed, which will be about the fourth of next month, she will then leave for Boyne City to go on her regular route, which will be between Boyne City and Charlevoix.

ZEITLER-CHRISTIE

Charlevoix Boy Marries a Joliet, Illinois, Young Lady.

The following from the Joliet, Ill. News of April 19, will be of interest to our many readers. Mr. Zeitler is the son of C. J. Zeitler a prominent business man of this city.

St. Patrick's church was the scene of a pretty but simple wedding yesterday, when Miss Cathryn Christie of this city became the bride of Andrew C. Zeitler of Charlevoix, Mich. The attendants were Miss Eva C. Zeitler, and Nicholas Briz, Jr., sister and brother-in-law, respectively of the groom. The bride's gown was of hand embroidered swiss, and she wore a tulle veil which fell from a wreath of flowers and foliage. The honor maid was also in white and like the bride, carried bride's roses.

After the ceremony a wedding breakfast were served at the home of the groom's sister, Mrs. Nicholas Briz, Jr., 403 Richmond street. There were forty-two guests and Mrs. Briz was assisted in serving by the Misses Zobel, Donnelly, Christie, Doyle and Baetinger.

Mr. and Mrs. Zeitler left last evening on a bridal tour through northern Michigan. After May first they will be at home to their friends in Charlevoix, Mich. The bride is a daughter of Mrs. J. Boal, of Braceyville.

CHARLEVOIX WINS

FIRST GAME

Defeats Petoskey in Opening Game of the Season

SCORE FOURTEEN TO THIRTEEN

Game Distinguished by Loose Playing by both Teams

Next Saturday's Game will be with Harbor Springs—Good Game Looked for—Root for Charlevoix.

Saturday, April 22, Charlevoix opened the baseball season by defeating Petoskey.

The fielders of both teams had a chance to show their skill owing to the heavy hitters of both teams.

The first game with Petoskey this year was somewhat different than that of last year, in which Charlevoix was defeated by the overwhelming score of 16 to 12.

Although our outfield is somewhat weak we expect to strengthen it with the promising material we have in, Grey, Lyngklip and Masho, and Bert Taylor.

The game went something as follows:

In the first inning our noble pitcher, Jim Gaskin, fanned out the first three men at bat.

Mitchell started out, batting list by being put out at first on a grounder. Bridge was next to handle the stick, getting a single and stealing the rest of the way round to third, was brought in by Krulik's hit. That was all of the scoring in that inning.

They got our pitcher's goat in the second inning by running in five scores, making the score 5 to 1.

This seemed to get the Charlevoix boys' nerve and we failed to get across the rubber until the fourth inning.

In the third inning Petoskey scored four more on account of an over throw and a hit.

Crane was the only one to reach home for us in the fourth, making the score 9 and 2 in Petoskey's favor.

In the fourth Mitchell went to the box, and showed his skill in pitching the rest of the game. They did not score in the fourth.

In the fifth the best we could do was to get Mitchell to third, Petoskey getting two scores making the score eleven to two.

In the sixth Charlevoix again failed to score. Petoskey also failed to make the rounds.

We woke up in the seventh with a batting rally running in three scores. Petoskey went down in one two, three, order.

We did better in the eighth and hit their pitcher for four more scores. Again they went out in one, two, three, order.

In the ninth they made the rounds twice, thirteen to nine, and leaving us one more chance to carry off the honors of the day, which we proceeded to do in professional style, hitting their pitcher out of the box and bringing in five scores with only one man down.

Score by innings:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9

Charlevoix..... 1 0 0 1 0 0 3 4 5 14

Petoskey..... 0 5 4 0 2 0 0 2 13

Next Saturday the boys will play the strong Harbor Springs team. A good game is expected. Turn out and root for Charlevoix, they need your assistance.

HOW UNCLE SAM FEEDS AND ARMS TROOPS IN TEXAS

Each Man Carries a Weight of Fifty-Four Pounds

Regular Rations and Those For Emergencies. "Iron Ration"

Khaki Being Supplanted by Cotton Olive Drab Uniform

ONE of the chief values of the present mobilization of one-fourth of the United States regular army along the Mexican border, to military men at least, is the opportunity offered to try out the more modern and lighter personal equipment for the individual soldier. Ever since military experts began a real study of conditions with the intention, if possible, of lightening the infantryman's burden the one foremost idea has been in lessening the number of pounds of accoutrement necessarily carried when under full field equipment.

While the officers had in mind the reduction of the actual weight of the outfit, it was figured that there must be no deviation in efficiency. Under the present United States army regulations the full field equipment for active service, including the rifle and ninety rounds of ammunition, weighs fifty-four pounds. It is the hope of the military experts to reduce this from fifteen to seventeen pounds, but the ever present idea remains in their mind—namely, that an equal efficiency must be obtained from the lighter articles. But it may be said also that it is hoped that greater worth may be obtained from the lighter accoutrement.

mattock per squad, three shovels per squad, three wire cutters per company and a two foot folding rule per company. These tools are in addition to the regular fifty-four pounds, and the soldiers take turns in carrying them.

Most of the troops in the Mexican border "war game" are equipped with the fifty-four pound outfit, but enough are using the lighter articles to insure a thorough tryout. Tin plates, meat cans, etc., instead of aluminum ones, are the staple mess equipment carried by the majority of the soldiers.

How Army Is Fed.

The different classification of rations given out to the regular army is another interesting point. In all there are some six specific rations, the principal ones being the haversack ration, the garrison ration, the travel ration and the emergency or iron ration. The haversack ration, such as dealt out to the troops in the field, consists of meat, coffee, hardtack, sugar, pepper and salt. The emergency ration is composed of compressed food having among its ingredients beef, sugar, salt, beans, potato and wheat. The soldiers are supposed to keep it in the sealed tins until express orders are given for its devouring. A small cake sufficient for a meal is broken into the regulation cup filled with boiling water, and dried out. The old adage about prevention and cure has come to be greatly realized in army circles. The Spanish-American war brought about the change in sanitary regulations, for during that campaign a comparison of the percentage of men killed by bullets and against the number dying by disease was startling.

Olive Drab Uniforms.

The uniform worn by the soldiers during actual service in hot climates and the change to the practical is of considerable interest. Once more it was a case of the war with Spain showing the lack of up to date wearing apparel for the troops. To be sure, there were khaki trousers, canvas leggings and the sun foiling wide brimmed campaign hats, but also there were the blue flannel shirts, an excellent target for the opposing marksmen. Under the present regulations the khaki uniforms have gone out entirely, while the cotton olive drab uniform is preferred. Olive drab shirts, too, are now worn, while the tan leggings and shoes to match make a body of men well nigh invisible at a reasonable distance. In the present mobilization in Texas thousands of troops will be seen wearing the khaki uniform, but the newest orders of the war department have done away with that dress and have placed the official O. K.

ment, not only in strength saving, but also in actual wear and tear. The use of aluminum plates, knives, forks and spoons, together with haversacks, tent halves, ponchos, tent poles, etc., of lesser weight, it is thought will bring down the total number of pounds per man.

The Soldier's Kit.

At present a soldier carries, besides his plate, a Springfield magazine, which weighs nine and a half pounds, and ninety pounds of cartridges, which weigh four and a half pounds; a bayonet, bayonet scabbard, a rifle sling, cartridge belt, a pair of cartridge belt suspenders which tend to lessen the weight by help from the shoulders, a first aid packet, a canteen and strap, a set of blanket roll straps, a haversack, a meat can, one cup, one plate, one knife, one fork, one spoon, half a shelter tent, one tent pole and five tent pegs. Then, in addition to that, comes his field kit, the weight of which is included in the total fifty-four pounds, consisting of a blanket, a poncho and personal effects, such as: comb, toothbrush, towel, extra underclothing, soap, etc.

But besides the soldier's individual load there are trenching tools which are given out and carried by company and squad. A full company is composed of 108 men and officers in time of war and sixty men and officers in time of peace. A squad, the second unit of a company, consists of eight men. The trenching tools are four hand picks to be carried by a company, a pick in a short time there is a palatable mass ready. When the soldier tries his first meal at the iron ration he thinks it is a pretty small matter, but very shortly he has the opinion that after all it was square meal. The other ration which is of interest just now, called the travel ration, is served out for troops traveling otherwise than marching and without cooking facilities.

When pack trains are possible portable stoves and ovens are used, but when a host of troops find themselves in actual service and perhaps pushing the campaign into the enemy's territory it is necessary to fall back on the severe haversack ration, sometimes with only water as a beverage, and then, again, in an extremely hot iron ration comes into play.

The sanitary corps, practiced in the science of keeping both and consequent disease out of the camps, is of the greatest importance in field work and has come to be one of the principal departments of the army. Attached to a regiment of 1,500 men and officers is a sanitary corps in command of a major, the usual head of a battalion. Under him the major has his staff of assistants, who inspect the disposal of refuse. Huge pits placed as far away from the camp as advisable are immediately dug and the strictest orders given to see that all waste is put in the proper place.

At certain times the pits are covered with cloth and thoroughly sprinkled with disinfectants, and whenever possible the process of incineration is carried on the more serviceable olive drab. Overcoats, the regulation bell top hats and blankets are all made of the olive drab. For colder countries the same cloth is used with a corresponding increase in weight. The time, of course, remains for the dress and full dress uniforms.

The absence of all possible ceremonies, such as parades and reviews, while in field service is noticeable to the veteran visiting a modern military camp.

The units of troops in order of magnitude with their commanding officers offer another subject of interest. Starting with the company, theoretically made up of 100 men and three officers, the next unit is the battalion, headed by a major. The organization of the battalion, however, is very elastic, it being composed of two, three or four companies. Following that division comes the regiment, which, having a full quota of men, numbers fifty-one officers, fifteen being mounted, and 1,500 enlisted men.

Theoretically three regiments, or 4,500 men, make a brigade of infantry. At the head of that organization is a brigadier general, who in turn has his staff.

The next organization is the division, composed of three infantry brigades, a regiment of cavalry, two regiments of artillery, a battalion of the signal corps, an ammunition train, supply train, four ambulance companies, a field hospital and reserve supplies. A major general commands and has under him approximately 20,000 men.

Did you ever stop to consider the Money Value of the energy you waste? Here is a simple, but mighty convincing, illustration:

Two walking steps are equal to One revolution of a bicycle pedal. The ordinary man covers little over five feet of ground in making two steps. The average bicycle rider will cover seventeen feet with one revolution of his pedal.

But, on a RACYCLE, with its standard gear, a rider will travel Twenty-one feet with Much Greater Ease than either the pedestrian or the other cyclist. Ride a RACYCLE and store your power.

What makes a Cream Separator good or bad

It takes something besides cast iron, red paint and hot air to make a separator that will skim-milk clean twice a day 365 days in the year for 15 or 20 years.

If some of the farmers who are thinking of buying a cream separator this season, and have been half persuaded by extravagant advertising to "save one-third the cost" by buying a machine of the "Just-as-good-as-the-DE LAVAL" or the "mail order" kind, could only listen to the experience of a few of the thousands of the users of such machines who have traded them in for DeLaval's during the past year, they would be forcibly reminded of the old adage which runs "Save at the spot and waste at the bung-hole."

We have a Separator that skims 750 pounds, warranted for 5 years, for $50. See us before buying.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

The crying demand of the hour for officials and especially executives who are possessed of rational and pronounced convictions, accompanied by indomitable perseverance and courage. One of the secrets of the making of such leaders may be found in the words of the new attorney general of Kansas. He states with evident pride that as a small boy he was a member of a total abstinence society similar to our Loyal Temperance legion, and that during his young manhood he lived in a prohibition state where the boys never even saw a saloon. The logical sequence is of course, that he is an ardent, enthusiastic believer in the prohibitory law of his state and intends aggressively to enforce it. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union looks hopefully and confidently forward to the time when every child and every young man and woman shall have such safe and sane environment, and when officials of the kind mentioned shall be the rule rather than the exception.

It is with rare pleasure that we take up the new bulletin of the summer school course of the University of Pennsylvania and read the course in Child Hygiene. The pleasure comes from the fact that at last a course is to be given that includes the effects of stimulants and narcotics upon the human organism. The teacher is at last to be taught. And what next? This—the indefatigable superintendent of scientific temperance instruction Sara Phillips Thomas of Philadelphia has pledged herself to establish twenty scholarships of fifteen dollars each, and twenty teachers who could not otherwise take this course who will now have the opportunity. Dr. Walter Stewart Cornell, demonstrator of Osteology and assistant demonstrator of Anatomy and lecturer on Psychology, will be the teacher, and his name assures us that the most careful instruction will be given. The question asked by Miss Thomas, "Does it not count for much that one of our great eastern educational institutions is now linked with the greatest problems of the day—the abolition of the liquor traffic?" can be answered in but one way. It certainly does count for much, and Pennsylvania, as well as the whole nation, is to be congratulated.

About one-half of the cities and practically all of rural Norway are under prohibition. To this fact, it is thought, is due the increase in the heights of recruits to the army between the years 1880 and 1907, while it is true that in French districts where the ravages of alcoholism are not marked, the heights of recruits to the army has diminished.

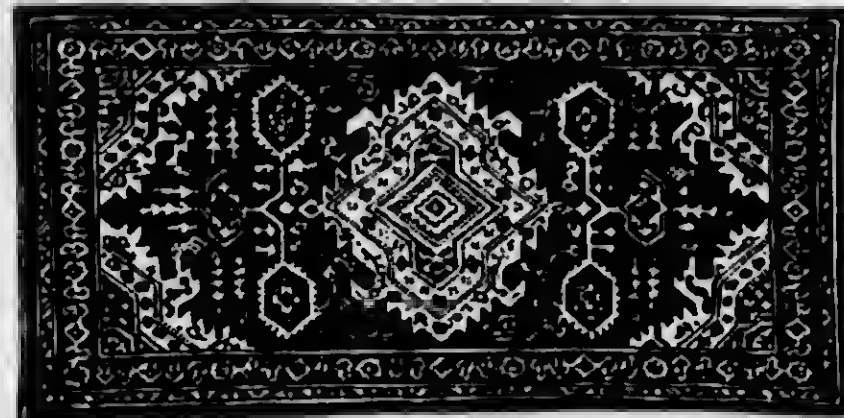

COMFORTING WORDS

Many a Charlevoix Household Will Find Them so.

To have the pains and aches of a bad back removed; to be entirely free from annoying, dangerous urinary disorders is enough to make any kidney sufferer grateful. To tell how this great change can be brought about will prove comforting words to hundreds of Charlevoix readers.

Nelson Burdo, 119 South B. St. Cheboygan, Mich., says: "Some twenty-five years ago I went to Detroit for an operation but the physician at the hospital told me that he could not take my case on account of the disordered condition of my kidneys. He advised me to use Doan's Kidney Pills and I did so. After I had taken the contents of four boxes I was completely cured and I was then able to have the operation performed. The principal symptom of my kidney trouble was a dull backache, sometimes accompanied by pains in my kidneys. I could hardly stoop or lift and whenever I caught cold, it settled on my kidneys, making me feel worse. The kidney secretions were highly colored and too frequent in passage and my whole system was run down. Doan's Ki-ney Pills helped me so greatly that I am only too glad to recommend them."

Mr. Burdo gave the above testimonial in August 1906 and when interviewed in July, 1909 he added: "You may continue to publish my former endorsement of Doan's Kidney Pills, for the relief they gave me have been permanent. I have recommended this remedy to other kidney sufferers and in every case benefit has followed its use."

Neighborhood Notes

The Western Michigan Development bureau is in receipt of a letter from a man in Samara, Russia, asking for information in regard to western Michigan land prices and fruit culture. The writer of the letter is in business in Russia but has been in this country and was particularly struck with the fruit from Michigan that he saw in the Chicago and other markets, and thinks that he would like to come here and buy a fruit farm and engage in raising apples and other fruit.—Traverse City Record-Eagle.

It is expected that Capt. J. C. Cantwell, the new commander of the revenue cutter, Tuscarora, took charge. Immediately thereafter the season's work began. There are fourteen men on the boat now and all are busy as hoppers flying up for the summer. The principal job is painting. The crew will be increased to 45 men by May 1.

The Women's Home and Foreign Missionary society of the Petoskey Presbytery has elected officers as follows: President, Mrs. C. E. Miller of Cadillac; vice-president, Mrs. H. Erwin of Harbor Springs; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. E. Knox of Cadillac; treasurer, Mrs. W. L. Curtis of Petoskey; recording secretary, Mrs. E. W. Martin of Boyne City; secretary of literature, Mrs. R. H. Harold of Lake City; young people's secretary, Mrs. F. Kaden of Boyne City.

Traverse City will be one of the few towns in Michigan and the only town in the northern part of the state to witness the flight of the aeroplane. Andrew Smith and his associates in the manufacture of his newly invented aeroplane engine has purchased one of the standard Bleriot aeroplanes, which it is expected will be delivered in Traverse City on or before May 1.

The company has planned for a practical test of the machine in one of the best airships made, and they are confident that the engine will prove a success. Mr. Smith states that there is no possible doubt that a flight will be given. The manufacturers of the aeroplane will send an expert aviator to conduct the test.

If this flight is successful definite steps will be taken to form a permanent organization to manufacture the engines. The first engine built was a 16 cylinder 75-horsepower machine which it will be remembered was tested on the ice some time ago. Two more engines of 8-cylinder, 35-horsepower capacity are now in the course of construction, and both sizes will be given a test in the aeroplane. The exact date of the exhibition will be announced later.—Record Eagle.

Plank Drag For Use Later on Worth Taking Up Farmer's Spare Time.
An effective plank drag which can be made easily in winter by any farmer, in order to have it ready for later use, is thus described by an Ohio correspondent in the Rural New Yorker:
The writer has used several kinds of drags on plowed fields and has seen a large number in use, ranging from a sled upside down to the lever harrow with the teeth set back. Of all the devices used for dragging the soil the drag shown in the diagram is probably most effective. The plank drag made by lapping some 2 by 8 inch plank works all right in very dry soil, but is all wrong for soils properly moist for best results in working. The drag shown here will work anywhere and at almost any time. Such a drag is easy to make and not at all expensive. In the diagrams a and b are 2 by 6 or 8 inch plank 7 feet long for two horses or 11 feet for three, a and d are 2 by 4 pieces bolted to the plank. c is a drift chain and may be fastened where shown or farther back, while xx are two short boards nailed in place for the driver to stand on. The latter, pieces, xx, should not be too wide, as they might cause the soil to collect and pack underneath. The plank a and b should be set at an angle of 30 degrees to d-d, and the joints should be secured with two bolts each. This drag is simple and strong and will stand a lot of rough usage in the field, and its use will give satisfaction to the user, and particularly where it is desired to level up inequalities of the surface. This drag cannot take the place of a harrow, roller or disk harrow, but it can do a few things more easily and quickly and in some cases far better.

The farmer driving through town with his prancing horses drawing a fine rig is the farmer on parade. The farmer in the field behind the plow is the farmer proving his right to be on parade.

Winter Keeping of Vegetables.

The matter of keeping fresh potatoes, cabbages, onions, beets, etc., all winter for family use depends on climatic conditions. Fresh potatoes, as also beets, should be guarded against freezing. Beets and carrots can stand a little of it, but are better off when kept from it. Cabbages stored in the cellar should be wrapped separately in double thicknesses of newspaper, folding and tying it around the stem. Hang each head upside down on the side of the wall or from the beams overhead. Cabbages can stand some freezing, but not too much of it, nor much freezing and thawing. Onions to keep well must be put in a cool, dry, airy place.—Farm and Fireside.

Manure From the Barnyard.

Manure from the barnyard adds humus to the soil, and humus acts like a sponge, retaining moisture in the soil, making it more capable of absorbing a heavy rainfall and of holding it there longer. The moral, therefore, is to save and carefully spread all barnyard manure over the fields. Manure is worth dollars and will put dollars into the farmer's pockets.

Plants For Winter Pasture.

Many plants can be used for winter pasture. Of course it is more difficult to secure winter than summer grazing, but with the proper use of our clover, rye, oats, vetch and crimson clover, all fall sown, there is little trouble to secure grazing areas through the winter.—Home and Farm.

Why Clover Fails.

Clover fails to grow of many farms, but the prime causes is that much of the humus of the soil is worn out and an acid condition exists that is detrimental to clover. A liberal application of lime will be beneficial.

TRUST THE WOMEN FOLK

The farmer who thinks he can "run his business" without taking his wife into his councils is pretty apt to run against a snag before he knows it. While women may not always understand all the fine points of farming, they are often able, through some divine instinct, to tell how things ought to be, and the man who trusts that instinct is not very apt to come out wrong.

Literary Notes

The Emperor of Imperial Valley.

Frances A. Groff, writing of western personalities in Sunset magazine for May, describes W. F. Holt, the big man of the Imperial Valley in California, as follows: "The Little Giant is a modern Moses who has not led people, out into the desert, which he has transformed into an electric-lighted, power-run, fertile garden, and the warm little twenty thousand dollars he took into the valley ten years ago has been converted into a cool million. There is an old Arab proverb that opportunity is like a baldheaded man with a beard—you can catch him coming, but you can't catch him going. Mr. Holt has always grasped old opportunity by the beard. Except for nine months in a business college in Quincy, Ill., and for an occasional trip to Chicago or Kansas City with cattle and hogs, Mr. Holt remained on the farm where he was born until twenty-one, when he married Miss Fannie Jones of the next farm and set up a small shop. It took four years and three small mercantile enterprises to lose the $5,000 his wife brought as dowry. They had been sweethearts from childhood and she was just as proud of him then as she is today. All wives take notice. Because never she complained her husband has given her $100 for every dollar he lost. A slight exercise in mental arithmetic shows Mrs. Holt to be worth half a million."

ALFALFA

By Milton M. Burnham.

Alfalfa should, if possible, be sown in the spring and as early as all danger of frost is over. A sharp frost settling upon it when quite young will utterly destroy it. It may be sown at any time in the season from June 1 to September 1, but this is not advised. After August 15 the risk of failure is very great.

Not much, if any less, than twenty pounds to the acre should be sown; one bushel to three acres.

While inoculation of the seed may not be necessary, owing to the possible existence of the necessary bacteria in the soil, still it should never be omitted inasmuch as it costs only two cents to make sure of the desired crop and also to certainly add much to the rapid development of the plants so as to aid them in their competition with the usual array of weeds and June grass.

Both the government of the United States and the Michigan Agricultural college will supply you with the proper inoculating material, with directions for use delivered to you without charge.

All you have to do is to write a request for the materials, stating the quantity of seed which you desire to sow and the date at which you wish to sow it. Address M. A. C., Lansing, Mich., or U. S. Dept. of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Probably the best method of sowing alfalfa is to use the old-style of hoe drill, sowing ten pounds to the acre, say north and south, and then ten pounds to the acre driving east and west. This insures a very even sowing and puts in about the right depth. After sowing roll the land thoroughly with a heavy roller, and then go over it again lightly with a wedder, built on the plan of a breed wedder. Use no "nurser crop." If you do you are likely to find to your great cost, that you have a "robber" instead of a "nurser."

As soon as the alfalfa has reached the height of about eight inches it will probably begin to show some small blossoms, at which time it should be cut with a mower and left where it falls. As soon as it grows up again and begins to blossom mow it a second time and leave it where it falls as before. The third growth can be safely left to grow in the winter standing as a further protection to the plants.

There is no danger that the alfalfa thus left will be found in the racks of the second year or that it will do damage in any other way.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a running sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; once case out of ten are cured by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surface.

Interesting Data About the Fisheries of Michigan From Authentic Sources—Trout in Lead.

All of the great lakes, except Lake Ontario, touch upon the state of Michigan, which makes it foremost among the great lakes states in the value of fishery products. This value has been increasing since 1890, as will appear in the forthcoming special report on the general census in 1908 of the fisheries of the United States, to be issued by Director E. Dana Durand, of the census bureau, and prepared under the supervision of Mr. William M. Stewart, chief statistician for manufacturers.

The value of the fishery products of the state in 1908 was $1,473,000, as compared with $1,224,000 in 1903 and $894,000 in 1890. There was a slight decrease in the number of persons employed in 1908 as compared with 1903, but, as in the case of other states, this may be due in part to the increased use of steam and motor boats, 415 at which were in use in 1908.

The value of the equipment in 1908 was $1,415,000, a considerable increase over the $962,000 reported in 1903. Vessels and boats, including outfit, increased in value from $391,000 in 1903 to $504,000 in 1908, while the apparatus employed increased in value from $508,000 in 1903 to $821,000 in 1908. The quantity of fish caught in 1908 was 38,302,000 pounds as compared with 35,669,000 pounds in 1903.

Michigan shares largely in the catch from all but one of the great lakes; Lake Michigan leading with $661,000 in value in 1908, Lake Huron following with $498,000, and then Lake Superior, $291,000; Lake Erie, $163,000, and Lake St. Clair, $32,000. Lake Michigan furnished 45 per cent both of weight and of value of the entire Michigan product, while Lake Huron contributed 31 per cent of the weight and 33 per cent of the value. Although the products of Lake Michigan was about one-third greater than that of Lake Huron the persons engaged in fishing numbered 114 less.

The total value of the equipment and other capital was $2,013,000 distributed in nearly the same proportion among the lakes as the value of the product. There was $327,000 invested in vessels and outfit; $267,000 in boats, of which $217,000 represents the value of steam and motor boats; $821,000 in apparatus of capture; $484,000 in shore and accessory property, while $114,000 was cash. Of the total investment $829,000 was in vessel fisheries, $1,150,000 in shore and boat fisheries, and $26,000 in transporting vessels. No sailing vessels were used and the number of sailboats was comparatively small. Gill nets and trap nets were the principal kinds of apparatus of capture.

Twenty-three species were taken in the fisheries of Michigan. Lake trout was first in rank, forming 20 per cent of the value of all products of the state, and white fish second with 23 per cent. Lake herring led in weight, with 39 per cent of the weight of all fishery products, but its value was only 21 per cent; while suckers and the various pike species combined, rank next in value. The value of these five species formed 87 per cent of the total value of the state's product. Trout represented 61 per cent of the value of the products taken in Lake Superior, while white fish and herring make up the greater part of the remaining product. No lake trout was reported from Lake Erie; German carp representing over one-third of the value of the catch in that lake. Lake St. Clair furnished principally wall-eyed pike and carp.

The value of the trout caught in the state fisheries was $121,000; herring $94,000; white fish $267,000; suckers $117,000; pike-perch $73,000; German carp $35,000; white fish $12,000; pike and pickerel $32,000; catfish and bullheads $12,000; sturgeon and caviar $9,999; all other $14,000; and muskellunge and muskrat skins, $1,200.

In 1903 there were 9,988,000 pounds of lake trout reported, and only 6,708,000 pounds in 1908, but the increase in price made the value of the 1908 catch only $2,000 less than that of 1903. White fish has shown a marked recovery from the downward movement apparent in 1890 and 1903, but the yield in 1908 was still far below that in 1890 with respect to quantity, but the increased price made the value greater than in any previous year. The yield in 1890 was 7,725,000 pounds of the value of $312,000, as compared with 4,775,000 pounds in 1908, worth $339,000. The total lake-herring catch in 1908 exceeded that of any previous year, amounting to 14,787,000 pounds of the value of $304,000, as compared with 12,986,000 pounds in 1903 valued at $248,000.

Suckers show a steady increase both in weight and value, but are worth only one-third as much as whitefish. The yield of pike-perch was less in 1908 than in any of the previous years for which a canvass was made, but its value, $98,000 was exceeded only by the catch of 1903, twice as great, which was worth $127,000. The yellow-perch catch has increased in value steadily up to $73,000 in 1908, though the quantity was much less than in 1890 or in 1890 when the value was only $40,000. German carp ranked seventh in value, with $35,000, and the quantity caught was greater than that of yellow perch. None was taken in Lake Superior, and very little in Lake Michigan, but it contributed over one-half of the weight and one-third in value of the total fishery product reported for Lake Erie, to which lake over two-thirds of the Michigan capture of carp is credited.

FIRST COMMUNION DAY

Thirty-three Boys and Girls in the Class Sunday Morning

At the Catholic Church Partake of the Blessed Sacrament.

Sunday morning was first Communion day at the St. Mary's Catholic church of this city, at which twenty boys and thirteen girls were at the altar for the first time to receive the blessed sacrament of Holy Eucharist.

The wore a white ribbon bow on their left arm, while the girls were dressed in white and wore wreaths of flowers on their heads. The children filed into the church, each carrying a candle. At the front of the church they renewed their baptismal vows and were seated during the services until at the communion, when the boys went to the altar in twos to receive the sacrament with two little boys acting as ushers, who carried a candle. The girls followed in their turn and with two smaller girls dressed in white carrying candles and acting as ushers for the girls of the communion class. After the class had received the sacrament, thirty-six of the parish members took their places at the rail and received the same sacrament.

The class of Sunday was large for this church, and it is hoped that the next class of children will be as large and as enthusiastic as this one.

Home of Mrs. Courter.

A number of relatives and friends of Mrs. Joe Courter from Charlevoix and Marion went out last Thursday to help celebrate her birthday. A sumptuous dinner was served to these ladies by the hostess and her daughter Mrs. Wesley Staley. The table was decorated with daisies. After dinner all her neighbors came in to enjoy the good things. A delicious lunch was served about four o'clock. Mrs. Courter received many beautiful presents.

All went away wishing her many returns of that happy day.

RED AND WHITE WINNERS

Home Team Again Out-play Visiting Team

By Score of 11 to 7—Urgent Request to Citizens to Attend Games.

Saturday, April 29, Charlevoix defeated the Harbor Springs high school team by a score of 11 to 7. Owing to an accident which occurred to the automobile in which the Harbor Springs boys came over here in they did not arrive until about three-thirty, and the game which was to have been called at two-thirty was delayed until four o'clock. This was a circumstance which could not be avoided. The members of the team who have started to nphbl the name of high school, which all the citizens of Charlevoix should be interested in, hope that this will not occur again and will do their best to avoid such undesirable delays in the future. Perhaps it was owing to this that there was such a small crowd out.

The boys are playing under greater difficulties than in previous years, owing to the fact that they have to develop six new players, including a new pitcher, which is hard for any team that even has the support of the citizens of the town they are trying to honor. A winning athletic team, in a school of this size brings the city in the eyes of the public as nothing else will do, and the citizens, and not only base ball fans, should show the greatest of interest in the national game, not merely as a sport, but from the good which they derive through a winning team. Turn out and advertise your city, and also have a good time.

In the game Saturday, Charlevoix was behind only in the first two innings, at no time during the remainder of the game was the home team at all in danger of losing. The feature of the game was the strong support that the outfields gave the battery, Gaskin and Capt. Kralik.

The next game the boys play at the home grounds will be the 20th of May, with Northport, who has opened the season by already defeating Traverse City and Cadillac.

EIGHTH GRADE EXAMINATION

Will be Held May 4 and 5, Note Change in Tuition Law.

The annual grade examination will be held on Thursday and Friday, May 4 and 5, beginning at 8:30 a. m. standard time.

The examination in reading will be based on "Evangeline."

Applicants will bring Legal Cap paper and pen or pencil.

The examination will be conducted in the high school buildings in the following named places: Charlevoix, Boyne City, East Jordan and St. James.

Rural pupils may select the most convenient place or if more convenient may attend elsewhere and have their papers forwarded to me, provided the examiner at such other place does not refuse to forward papers.

The recent legislative amended the tuition law making it necessary that a pupil shall be the holder of an eighth grade diploma in order to have his tuition paid by the district. (This does not apply to ninth graders who had their tuition paid last year.)

This makes the examination an important factor to any one from the rural districts who may wish to attend high school.

The examination will be made as practical as possible and will be fair and free from puzzles.

An average of 80 per cent with a minimum of 70 per cent will be required for a diploma.

Teachers will please see to it that all prospective high school pupils understand the importance of this examination and urge them to attend.

Each applicant will bring a certificate from his teacher stating the length of time that he has pursued the studies of the eighth grade.

THREE ORGANIZATIONS

Now Working Toward Development of Untenanted Lands

Task a Gigantic One and Must Have Strong Support

Citizens of the extreme southern portion of Michigan are rekindled from time to time that there is considerable activity being displayed in the line of developing, agriculturally, the upper half of the lower peninsula and the entire area of the upper peninsula. Busy with their own affairs, they have little inclination to give heed to the significance of a movement that is destined to play an increasingly important part in the future history of the state.

In the western and northern counties of Michigan there is an organization now several years old that is known as the "Western Michigan Development Bureau;" in the counties lying west and south of Bay City there is a second organization known as the "Northwestern Michigan Development Bureau," now over a year old. In the upper peninsula there has recently been created a third organization known as the Upper Peninsula Development Bureau, and that embraces in its membership representatives of every county in that section of the state, as well as men connected prominently with vast enterprises of mining, lumbering and agriculture. Each of these three organizations is striving primarily to attain the same results; that of settling three untenanted acres with men and women who will carry on agriculture, create cities and in general bring about a condition of established prosperity like that enjoyed in the more favored southern counties of the state. The task is a gigantic one as those who are engaged in the work are well aware. Much prejudice and ignorance must be dispelled even among the citizens of our own state. A land that has long borne the reputation of being an infertile and inhospitable wilderness cannot be populated and made productive over night.

Aside from the fact that every citizen in the state will be benefited by the increased amount of taxable property that will be brought into existence in these undeveloped districts, there are other and more immediate benefits that will come to breeders of pure bred dairy cattle. It is well recognized that dairying in the form of agriculture best adapted to both soil and climate in the districts being developed. In each of the associations there are men who are influential in their affairs and who are likewise prominent as dairymen and breeders. These men know what dairying has done for them and others in each of the three districts and they may be counted upon to encourage the industry as can no others who have not had the practical experience. On the western side of the state there is D. H. Day, president of that bureau and a leading Holstein breeder; on the eastern side is T. F. Marston, secretary of that bureau and a Jersey breeder of national reputation; in the northern peninsula there is W. S. Prickett, owner of "Rovercroft Farm" at Sidaow, and Alton T. Roberts of Marquette, manager of the Embury Dairy and an official on the Upper Peninsula Development bureau.

Not at once, but slowly in the next few years we will see the efforts of the influence these men will exert to build up their sections of the state into prosperous dairying districts. There will be an increasingly strong demand for pure bred sires and cows and the logical place for these settlers to go for their cows is to the herds now flourishing in the southern counties of the state.

Every citizen of Michigan should do what he can toward aiding the work of these three development bureaus, but especially should the breeders of purebred dairy cattle seek to promote the work. Michigan is now in a fair way toward becoming the leading dairy state in the nation, with less than half of her soil area under cultivation. At the onset of the work of developing the cultivated half it devolves upon us all to see that dairying is made the chief industry; both as a means of creating a market for our surplus stock and also because it will be the last step necessary to outstrip our neighbor, Wisconsin.

and enable us to make the proud claim: "Michigan, the greatest dairy state in the union."

CHARLES A. DAYLESS

Former Resident of East Jordan Dies at Elk Rapids.

Charles A. Dayless, for many years a resident of East Jordan, was found dead in bed at his home in Elk Rapids on Sunday last April 23. He had been sick most of the winter, but his death was unexpected. Deceased was born in Toronto, Canada, January 11, 1843, and came to Michigan when he was thirty-five years old, locating first at LaPeer and later at East Jordan. For many years he owned and controlled the brick yard at East Jordan, his wife preceding him four years old. He leaves twelve children, five girls and seven boys; Mrs. Frank Bader at Walloon Lake, Mrs. Grant Snelling at Newbury, Mrs. Floyd Moore at Central Lake, Mrs. Jess Shuy and George Dayless at Boyne City, Mrs. Harry Parks, Louis Fred Holly, Jess, Barney and Ray of East Jordan. He also leaves three sisters and one brother. Funeral services were held from the home of his son, Louis, on Tuesday afternoon, the body being brought to East Jordan for burial.

WERE LAYING FOR HIM

Two Hoboes From Grand Rapids Arrested at Boyne City

Each Armed With Revolvers and Were After Herman L. Swift.

Saturday two boys were arrested at Boyne City as suspicious characters by Chief of Police McKenzie and Paul LaFleur.

The boys who gave their names as Lincoln Higgins, aged 15, and James Higgins, aged 17, came here a week ago from Grand Rapids and according to their story, were forced to leave that city on account of the furniture strike, walking a part of the way, and arriving in Charlevoix last Sunday, came on foot to this city Monday and they have been living according to their story in true hobo fashion ever since. They claim to have been sleeping in a vacant house on the Roger's farm which is now known as the Swift place and have been cooking their meals at, or near the Swift gravel pit in the hills near the Beulah home.

Complaint had been made to the officers and they were on the watch for the lads, all day Saturday, but they were slippery and it was only after a deal of shadowing and watching for them that they were finally captured.

When captured by the officers, each boy had a 32 calibre revolver, loaded with five cartridges apiece and a box of cartridges in their possession. The officers insisted on their turning over the balance of their possessions and they dug up a loaded rifle and a shot gun from the hay mow of a barn, also a small, square sample case, made of leather with brass corners and trimmings which contained a small amount of clothing. One boy had $1.10, the other 30c in money and they carried a big bunch of keys.

The two boys claim that they were inmates of the Beulah Home for four years, leaving there two years ago, and according to their story to the officers, are here for the purpose of "getting even" with Swift and the former, foreman at the Home. They tell a story similar to the boys who originated the charges against Swift in the suit that has so blackened the character of the Home and say they were "laying" for Swift because the courts have so long deferred action in his case, thinking that if the law could not punish him that it was up to them to take the law into their own hands. Whether there is any truth in the story or not remains to be seen. They are held on a charge of simply lurking upon instructions from Prosecutor Fitch until Judge Harris of the juvenile court gets home, when they will be turned over to him and the matter duly investigated.

STEAMER HUM

GOOD AS NEW

Rebuilt in Silas Swails' Ship Yard
During Winter

WILL BE INSPECTED HERE TODAY

And Makes First Trip to East Jordan
Tomorrow

Hull of All New Material—Workmanship of Experienced Mechanic—Will Develop More Speed.

The Steamer Hum is now completely rebuilt and ready for business. This boat which is owned by Mrs. Florence Jepson of East Jordan, was brought to the Charlevoix ship yards November 12, and since that time Silas Swails has rebuilt the boat, the hull being of new material and the workmanship is that of the clever mechanic and art.

In the construction of the hull, 16,000 feet of white oak and rock elm were used. Also 800 pounds of spikes and 3,000 pounds of round iron were used to make this popular boat as good as new. The water lines are changed and the boat rests eight inches higher out of water than previous. The hull has been repainted white and the water lines are painted green.

Among the improvements to be found are water tight compartments, which would enable the bow to be cut off and still she would not sink. A new steering gear has been added. The smoke stack raised higher, greatly improves the look of the boat. A new ten-inch diameter search-light will be placed upon the boat. The rebuilding of the Hum has increased her speed about two miles per hour.

The Hum will be inspected in this city today and will leave on her first trip to East Jordan Thursday. Sunday excursions will be chartered from here throughout the summer, from some logical point.

The new captain, William P. Jepson, of Milwaukee, is a young man, who promises to give the people the best available accommodations possible throughout the season. Mr. Jepson has good papers and is reliable, and the Hum ought to earn a reputation that will exceed any of its previous attempts of progression.

Mr. Swails should be complimented on his clever workmanship in the reconstruction of this ship, and that he has scored another mark of success is a question that is undeniable. Every part of the work was under the direct supervision of Mr. Swails, and shows it, self plainly as a work of art to any one who will spend a few minutes studying the boat.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

Our Teachers and Local Option.

The teachers in our public schools are as a class, an able body of men and women. They are not nearly appreciated at their full value, and in the great majority of cases are wretchedly paid for the taxing and valuable service rendered. These men and women in a most striking and vital way are the guardians of the home and builders of the state.

Almost without exception the teachers in the public schools of Michigan are for local option and abolition of the saloon. Their constant experience in the schoolroom shows with terrible vividness the awful handicap upon our future citizenship which the saloon imposes; that the children from a saloon-cursed home do not as a rule have a fair chance in the battle of life with the children from other homes; that they are poorly nourished, poorly clothed, depressed and crucified in spirit; that where the children are taught to drink, as is often the case in some parts of the state, their mental progress is most seriously impaired; that the effect of drinking beer on the brain of a child is most serious is amply sustained by the testimony of scientists and physicians everywhere.

There is no "Responsible" Saloons.

Good citizens of a number of Iowa cities are exerting themselves in preventing the saloonkeepers securing a sufficient number of petitioners to enable them to procure licenses to continue in business another year. This has stirred the liquor press to activity and it is having one spoon after another. The Keokuk Gate City is one of these pro-liquor sheets and concerning the movement in that city it says:

"If the Anti Saloon League prosecution in Keokuk are in good faith for the purpose of putting the saloons out of business, the question at once arises whether Keokuk is to have a responsible and regulated saloon or the irresponsible and unregulated bootleggers, whom the traffic is to be kept in the open, where it can be controlled, or driven into hiding, where it cannot be reached."

That paper will tell no intelligent person with the above. There is no such institution as the "responsible" and "regulated" saloon, not even in Iowa. The more you keep the saloons in the open the less it will be controlled, and the farther you drive it into hiding the less deviant it will do. A blind and vicious animal is not nearly so dangerous as the one which can see and which is permitted to go and do what he pleases.

Here's a Good Showing.

Chief Justice Clark of the supreme bench of North Carolina gives it as his opinion that the prohibitory law in that state has reduced crime 50 per cent. The returns for last year and this year prove the statement of Judge Clark. Murder in the first degree showed a decline of 32 per cent in the two years, burglary 20 per cent, larceny 40 per cent, manslaughter 35 per cent, murder in the second degree 21 per cent, minor crimes from 25 to 50 per cent. There has also been a falling off of 15 per cent in violations of the anti-liquor laws. Judge Clark has prepared a five year's comparison which shows that some crimes have decreased more than 60 per cent since the saloons of the state were closed.

What makes a Cream Separator good or bad

It takes something besides cast iron, red paint and hot air to make a separator that will skim milk clean twice a day 365 days in the year for 15 or 20 years.

If some of the farmers who are thinking of buying a cream separator this season, and have been half persuaded by extravagant advertising to "save one-third the cost" by buying a machine of the "Just-as-good-as-the-DE LAVAL" or the "mail order" kind, could only listen to the experience of a few of the thousands of the users of such machines who have traded them in for DeLaval's during the past year, they would be forcibly reminded of the old adage which runs "Save at the spout and waste at the bung-hole."

We have a Separator that skins 750 pounds, warranted for 5 years, for $50. See us before buying.

In one of Rudyard Kipling's writings he tells of "the ship that found herself," and in "The Fortune Hunter" we have the fascinating narrative of "a youth who found himself." The youth is like the ship—he had to have his course laid straight before his career began to make substantial headway. The story of Nat Duncan is one that in dramatic form, as written by Winchell Smith, has attracted the attention of thousands of playgoers throughout the country. As a novel, written by Louis Joseph Vance, it becomes a narrative of profound appeal to the young and old and especially to those of us who in our youth dwell in a rural district far enough removed from the metropolitan centers to be practically a world in itself, and to itself usually it is the country lad who ventures into the great cities to seek fortune and fame's favor. But here we find a down to date city youth, who, a failure at everything he had undertaken, invades the rural districts to make a millionaire of himself. That which befalls him prompted a great New York newspaper editor to say, "Every American should read this great story," for "The Fortune Hunter," in spite of its enjoyable humor, subtly points the vital lesson of the need of charity and tolerance for the less fortunate of human beings.

CHAPTER I.
RECEIVER at ear, Spaulding, of Messrs. Atwater & Spaulding, Importers of motorizing equipments and accessories, listened to the switchboard operator's announcement with grave attention, acknowledging it with a toneless "All right; send him in." Then, looking up the desk telephone, he aving round in his chair to face the door of his private office and in a brief ensuig interval painstakingly frowned out of his face and attitude every indication of the frame of mind in which he awaited his caller. It was, as a matter of fact, anything but a pleasant one. He had a distasteful duty to perform, but that was the last thing he designed to become evident. Like most good business men, he nursed a pet superstition or two, and of the number of these the first was that he must in all his dealings present an inscrutable front, like a poker player's. Captains of industry were uniformly like that, Spaulding understood. If they entertained emotions it was strictly in private.

Occasionally this attitude deceived others. Notably now it bewildered Duncan as he entered on the echo of Spaulding's "Come in." He had apprehended the visage of a thunderstorm with a rattle of brusque complaints. He encountered Spaulding as he had always seemed—a little, urbane figure with a blank face, the blazer for glasses whose lenses seemed always to catch the light and, glaring, mask the eyes behind them; a prosperous man of affairs, well groomed both as to body and as to mind; a machine for the transaction of business with all a machine's vivacity and temperamental responsiveness. It was just that quality in him that Duncan envied, who was vaguely impressed that if he himself could imitate, however minutely, the phlegm of a machine he might learn to do something of its efficiency and so ultimately prove himself of some worth to the world and incidentally to Nathaniel Duncan.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Spaulding," he said, replying to a nod as he dropped into the chair that had had indicated a faint smile lightened his expression and made it quite engaging.

with his eyebrows, for once fairly surprised out of his pose. "Your advice?" "Yes," said Duncan evenly, "as to whether you ought to give up your customers on my route or send them a man who could sell goods."

"Well?" Spaulding admitted.

"Oh don't think I'm boasting of my acuteness. Anybody could have guessed as much from the great number of heavy orders I have not been sending you."

"You've had bad luck."

"You mean you have, Mr. Spaulding? It was good luck for me to be drawn ing down my weekly checks, had luck to you not to have a man who could earn them."

His desperate honesty touched Spaulding a trifle. At the risk of not securing a business man to himself he yielded dubiously to relent, to give Duncan another chance.

"Duncan," he said, "what's the trouble?"

"I thought you knew that; I thought that was why you called me in with my route half covered."

"You mean—"

"I mean I can't sell your line."

"Why?"

"God only knows. I want to badly enough. It's just general incompetence, I presume."

"What makes you think that?"

Duncan smiled bitterly. "Experience," he said.

"You've tried—what else?"

"A little of everything, all the jobs open to a man with a knowledge of Latin and Greek and the higher mathematics—shipping clerk, timekeeper, cashier, all of 'em."

"And yet Kellogg believes in you."

Duncan nodded dolefully. "Harry's a good friend. We roomed together in college. That's why he stands for me."

"He says you only need the right opening."

And nobody knows where that is, except my fortunate employers. It's the back door going out for mine every time. Oh, Harry's been a prince to me. He's found me four or five jobs with friends of his, like yourself. But I don't seem to last. You see, I was brought up to be ornamental and if regular rather than useful, to show about in motorcars and keep a velvet busy sixteen hours a day, and all that sort of thing. My father's failure—you know about that?"

Spaulding nodded. Duncan went on gloomily, talking a great deal more freely than he would have talked at any other time—suffering, in fact, from that species of auto-hypnosis induced by the sound of his own voice recounting his misfortunes which seems especially to affect a man down on his luck.

"That smash came when I was five years out of college. I'd never thought of turning my hand to anything in all that time. I'd always had more coin than I could spend—never had to consider the worth of money or how hard it is to earn. My father saw to all that. He seemed and in want me to work; not that I held that against him. It'd an idea I'd turn out a genius of some sort or other, I believe. Well, he failed and died all in a week, and I found myself left with an extensive wardrobe, expensive tastes, an impractical education—and not so much of that that you'd notice it—and not a cent. I was too proud to look to my friends for help in those days—and perhaps that was as well; I sought jobs on my own. Did you ever keep books in a fish market?"

"No," Spaulding's eyes twinkled behind his large, shiny glasses.

"But what's the use of my boring you?" Duncan made as if to rise, suddenly remembering himself.

"You're not. Go on."

"I didn't mean to. Mostly, I presume, I've been blundering round an explanation of Kellogg's kindness to me, in my usual ineffectual way, but I felt an explanation was due you, as the latest to suffer through his misplaced interest in me."

"Perhaps," said Spaulding, "I am beginning to understand. Go on, I'm interested. About the fish market?"

"Oh, it just happened to think of it as a sample experience, and the last of that particular brand. I got $9 a week and earned every cent of it lulling the atmosphere. My board cost me $1 and the other $3 afforded me a chance to demonstrate myself a captain of finance, paying laundry bills and clothing myself, besides buying lunches and such like small matters. I did the whole thing, you know, one schooner of beer a day and made my own cigarettes. Never could make up my mind which was the worst. The hours were easy, too; didn't have to get to work until 5 in the morning. I lasted five weeks at that job before I was taken sick. Shows what a great constitution I've got."

"And then?"

"Oh"—Duncan roused. "Why, then I fell in with Kellogg again; he found me trying the open air cure on a bench in Washington square. Since then he's been finding me one berth after another. He's a sure enough optimist."

Spaulding shifted uneasily in his chair, stirred by an impulse whose unwisdom he could not doubt. Duncan had assuredly done his case no good by painting his shortcomings in colors so vivid; yet somehow, strangely, Spaulding liked him the better for his open hearted confession.

"Well"—Spaulding stammered awkwardly.

"Yes, of course," said Duncan promptly, rising. "Sorry if I tired you."

"What do you mean by 'Yes, of course'?"

"That you called me in to fire me—and so that's over with. Only I'd be sorry to have you sore on Kellogg for saddling me on you. You see, he believed I'd make good, and so I did in a way; at least I hoped to."

"Oh, that's all right," said Spaulding uncomfortably. "The trouble is, you see, we've nothing else open just now, but if you'd really like another chance on the road I'll be glad to speak to Mr. Atwater about it."

"Don't you do it!" Duncan counselled him sharply, agitated. "He might say yes. And I simply couldn't accept; it wouldn't be fair to you, Kellogg or myself. It'd be charity, for I've proved I can't earn my wages, and I haven't come to that yet. No!" he concluded with determination and picked up his hat.

"Just a minute," Spaulding held him with a gesture. "You're forgetting something—at least I am. There's a month's pay coming to you. The cashier will hand you the check as you go out."

"A month's pay?" Duncan said blankly. "How's that? I've drawn up to the end of this week already. If you didn't know it."

"Of course I know it. But we never let our men go without a month's notice or its equivalent, and—"

"No," Duncan interrupted firmly—"no; but thank you just the same. I couldn't—I really couldn't. It's good of you, but—Now," he broke off abruptly, "I've left my accounts, what there is of them, with the bookkeeping department, and the checks for my simple trunks. There'll be a few dollars coming to me on my expense account, and I'll send you my address as soon as I get one."

"But, look here," Spaulding got to his feet, frowning.

"No," reiterated Duncan positively, "there's no use, I'm grateful to you for your toleration of me and all that, but we can't do anything better now than call it all off. Goodbye, Mr. Spaulding."

Spaulding nodded, accepting defeat with the better grace because of an innate conviction that it was just as well after all. And, furthermore, he admired Duncan's stand, so he offered his hand—an unusual condescension. "You'll make good somewhere yet," he asserted.

"I wish I could believe it," Duncan's grasp was firm since he felt more assured of some humanity latent in his late employer. "However, goodbye."

"Good luck to you," rang in his ears as the door put a period to the interview. He stepped and took up the battered suitcase and rusty overcoat which he had left outside the junior partner's office, then went on, shaking his head. "Much obliged," he said huskily to himself, "but what's the good of that? There's no room any where for a professional failure, and that's what I am just a never-dewell. I never realized what that meant really before, and it's certainly taken me a damn' long time to find out. But I know now, all right."

Despondently he went down to the sidewalk and nudged himself with the crowd, moving with it, though a thousand miles apart from it, and presently diverging, struck across town toward the North street car station.

The Board of Public Works reported the request of H. L. Decker to connect with the Dixon Ave. sewer through the property of O. E. Wilbur, Mr. Decker to furnish six inch pipe in exchange for four inch pipe and to stand all additional expense there may be on account of changing plans and specifications attached to and made a part of the contract with W. R. Caldwell for constructing sewer in Michigan and Dixon Aves.

The request was granted by the Board of Public Works.
 Fred L. Slaght,
 Deputy Clerk.

Ald. Swinton offered the following resolution and moved it adopted.

Resolved, That the request of H. L. Decker that he and O. E. Wilbur be allowed to build a six inch lateral through O. E. Wilbur's property, so that Mr. Decker may connect his residence with the sewer with the Dixon Avenue sewer. Mr. Decker to pay all additional cost on account of changing plans and specifications attached to and made a part of the contract with W. R. Caldwell for constructing sewer in Michigan and Dixon Avenues.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the Common Council the second day of May, A. D. 1911, by the following aye and nay vote:

Ayes, Swinton, Glassford, Nordrum, Rachow and Webster.
 Nays, none.

To Ernest Hilber,
 City Clerk.
 You are hereby notified that I do hereby sign off the immediate operation of the resolution granting Mr. Decker permission to connect his residence situated on Ames street with the Dixon Avenue sewer.

Dated, May 2, 1911.
 W. J. Rachow,
 Mayor.

Reasons for veto of resolution granting Mr. Decker permission to connect across O. E. Wilbur's lot on Dixon Ave. sewer.

1st. It requires a changed contract with the sewer contractor which is liable to cause complications.

2nd. The council has already adopted plans for a sewer on Ames street and to start now to grant property owners permission to attach to sewer lines, will be considered a dangerous precedent and since the bills are laid down the plans prepared and executed will be shifted for those who can pay the bill. The Dixon Ave. sewer will seek to be shifted to those who should not be the burden of the franchise.

W. J. Rachow, Mayor.
 Moved by Ald. Rachow and seconded by Ald. Nordrum that the matter of installing lamp poles and stands for River street be referred to the city sewer inspectors with power to act. Motion carried.

Moved by Ald. Webster and seconded by Ald. Webster that the request of property owners on Dixon Ave. for permission to use joint laterals for not to exceed two houses be granted. Motion carried.

The sealed proposals for the paving of Michigan and Dixon Aves. were opened and read and referred to the committee on streets and finance with instructions to have them tabulated by George S. Pearson, consulting engineer, and to make a report on May 10th 1911.

There being no further business the Council adjourned.
 E. J. Hillier,
 City Clerk.

MISFORTUNES.

If all the misfortunes of mankind were cast into a public stock in order that they might be equally distributed among the whole species those who now look upon themselves as the most unhappy of mortals would prefer the share they are already possessed of before that share which would fall to them by such division.—Socrates.

Neighborhood Notes

In a brief review of the legal notes come of the case wherein F. L. Baldwin, of the Escanaba Journal, boycotted by saloonists and others because he attacked the traffic, brought suit and recovered damages in the sum of $1,000, the supreme court confirming the same, Editor Baldwin says there was nothing at all pleasant in the fight, but a great principal was at stake, and he fought it out. He says: "Previous to the coming of the writer to the city the liquor interests dominated the city and its politics. It was considered foolhardy for any man to antagonize the saloonmen, and when The Journal delivered its first broadside the editor was told by a man who was sent to him for that purpose that, 'if you intend to fight the saloons you can't stay in Escanaba six months.' That was nearly four and a half years ago. The Journal is still here, and the same fingers still pound the type-writer."—Michigan Bulletin.

Miss Exie Stratinger, fifteen years old, was accidentally shot through the head by a neighbor boy, Harry Watkins, twelve years old, in Custer township last Monday. She lived about seven hours but did not regain consciousness.

With her brother Vernie and Harry Watkins the girl had gone with the team to haul corn stalks to the barn and while in the field had been throwing up stones and bits of wood for the boys to shoot at. She climbed into the wagon just as Harry shot across the wagon and the bullet struck near the ear and came out of the head on the opposite side.

Prosecuting Attorney Thos. D. Meggison and the coroner were sent for and a jury was impaneled, who brought in a verdict that she was shot accidentally by Harry Watkins.—Bellaire Independent.

N. P. Hull, master of the state grange announced that 30,000 signatures had been signed to a petition opposing reciprocity, to be sent to Senators Smith and Townsend in Washington. Hull said that Smith is against the measure and Townsend for it.

Perry F. Powers, publisher of the Cadillac Evening News, has recently purchased the Cadillac Citizen, which has been published there for several years. During the last few years there have been three daily papers in Cadillac, which is large enough for one daily paper. For some time this condition has been realized by Cadillac publishers and now the Citizen has been merged with the News. Charles Stanley, for many years publisher of the State Democrat and the Cadillac Daily Citizen recently, will leave Cadillac and locate in Muskegon, where he has purchased stock in a new publishing enterprise which will issue the Morning Times, beginning about the middle of May. This will give Muskegon a second newspaper, the Chronicle having occupied the field alone for several years.

The state board of auditors decided that they could legally pay the cost of maintaining the Michigan Pioneer and Historical society, and despite the fact that the governor vetoed the bill granting the society an appropriation, it will not pass out of existence.

Literary Notes

Waste in the Household.

"In discussing the little phrase 'cost of high living' we want to identify it with 'waste' as it exists in the American home of moderate means. Folly causes waste, among the idle rich, ignorance causes it among the wretchedly poor. But in the home over which there presides an apparently intelligent, earnest woman, why should there be waste? Because intelligence and earnestness go down before three factors of modern life—haste, false values and false pride. The little leaks which in the end represent the cost of high living can be traced to one of these three causes. Of late years the American woman has adopted the slogan of her husband and son, 'Time is money.' She seizes upon every time saving device. She rushes her housekeeping as her husband rushes his employees. The result is the peculiar form of high living in the home that did not exist when more time was given to its management," says Woman's Home Companion for May.

"Take the single article of marketing. Investigators have reported that only one-third of the housekeepers in American cities and towns do their own marketing. The other two-thirds intrust it save, on special occasions, to servants, children and the telephone. In the average towns where the telephone service is unlimited three-fourths of the ordering at butcher-shops and groceries are done over the wire. Dealers all approve the telephone method because it is a time-saver for them as well as the customer. Many of them maintain that it is fully as economical for the housewife, but actual investigation proves that this is not true. The housewife who selects her meats and green vegetables with personal care and discusses comparative prices of different brands in groceries saves from five to fifteen per cent. of her orders. These figures were furnished by representatives of three reliable firms in as many typical cities: New York, Detroit and Baltimore, and the same figures have been found to hold in smaller towns and cities. Yours may be the exception to the rule, but find out if this is so; don't take anybody's word for it.

Competitive Gardens for Children.

"If children take an interest in agricultural work," writes Clifford H. Woodhams in the May Sunset Magazine, "or if some outside inducement is offered to attract them to it, many hours that might not be spent to so good advantage will be taken up with a healthy and pleasant occupation. In a recent garden test in Palo Alto, Santa Clara valley, California, eighty-seven boys and girls entered the contest and about fifty gardens yielded excellent results. The committee bought the seeds and blubs and supplied them to the children at the regular price, so that no one child had the advantage over the others. The prizes were: bright silver dollars in small envelopes. Both the girls and boys that entered the contest enjoyed the work in addition to the financial results, some of them keeping up their gardens for their own pleasure and amusement."

Williams and Van Alstyne, a very popular and prolific team of song-writers, never fail to have one or two big successes on the song market, and at present they have a novelty in the song line, a typical New York 'White Way' song which is popular in all the restaurants where "swelldom" dines after the theater. The title of the song, "Who are You With Tonight?" seems to be the popular salutation as the guests arrive and greet those that they know. It is the old story to tell in a new way and, while the song has no moral to speak of, many a poor, deluded man and woman has been brought to reflect by the abrupt manner of the jocular questioner who seeks the information. Upon the stage the song has also proved a success, especially where the singer has been able to pick out some stranger in the audience, who was having a good time in New York. On one occasion a vaudeville singer had selected what in his opinion was an "easy mark." But to his mortification and to the delight of the audience the man got up and flourished a legal paper, got the lady with him to also stand up and introduced himself and her as Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Thomson, of Olean, Pa., just married and having a good time. He seemed delighted at the disclosure of the singer, and as the orchestra played the chorus he himself led the whole audience in singing—

"Who are you with to-night, to-night?"

Oh! who are you with to-night?

Who is the drowsy, peach and creamy vision of sweet delight?

Is it your little sister, Mister? Answer me, honor bright—

Will you tell your wife in the morning?

Who were you with to-night?

Eyes With Double Pupils.
Cicero says that "the glance of all women with the double pupil to the eye is noxious, blighting and withering." Cicero tells us that such persons would not drown. Still others say that if they did drown the body would never sink, neither would it decay. They could cure the disease of the chest—consumption—by rubbing their perspiration on the affected parts of the individual, and in case the double pupils were red instead of black they could cure the lepers and the blind. So thought the ancients.

ROYAL Baking Powder Economy

The manufacturers of Royal Baking Powder have always declined to produce a cheap baking powder at the sacrifice of quality.

Royal Baking Powder is made from pure grape cream of tartar, and is the embodiment of all the excellence possible to be attained in the highest class baking powder.

Royal Baking Powder costs only a fair price, and is more economical at its price than any other leavening agent, because of the superlative quality and absolute wholesomeness of the food it makes.

Mixtures made in imitation of baking powders, but containing alum, are frequently distributed from door to door, or given away in grocery stores. Such mixtures are dangerous to use in food. In England, France, Germany and some sections of the United States their sale is prohibited by law. Alum is a dangerous mineral acid, and all physicians condemn baking powders containing it.

The label of alum baking powders must show the ingredients.

salt, hosiery harness, etc., at prices that would reduce the "high cost of living."

Our program was especially good, as the contest for points between the two sides led by O. D. Willson and Miss Mildred Leller is getting spirited. Several of the members have learned portions of vital work. We had several pieces of music, vocal and instrumental, three original essays, two of which were in regard to our county fair, one, "The Practical Benefits of a County Fair" by L. D. Willson and the other, "The Agricultural Fair as an Educational Institution," by H. L. Willson. It was proposed that the State Agricultural college and experimental stations should be asked to make exhibits and send competent men to give information in regard to the latest methods. This has been done in some states and with very good results in the interest shown and also creating higher ideals or standards of excellence. The government has issued a circular, No. 109 in regard to the matter. Let's see if we cannot get benefit of the state work in agriculture right here in our own county.

Miss Leller's side is still in the lead in the contest.

The grange decided to hold an open meeting to try to interest our new neighbors in grange work about the middle of May.

A Great Dog Town.

The greatest dog town in Great Britain, if not in the world, is Haverfordwest. There are a great many men in the town who live wholly and make a good living by breeding, buying and selling dogs. Although the population is only 6,000, at least 6,000 dog licenses are issued annually, and there are also a large number of exemptions. Almost daily there are more dogs than people in the public streets, though valuable animals are never allowed to run loose. Haverfordwest dog breeders are known for their working terriers, show-terriers, pointers, setters and spaniels, which are daily traded for big sums through the fanciers' journals and go everywhere. It is the home of the Seton-ham breed of terriers, the origin of which has puzzled the keenest sportsmen. One fancier's kennel recently sold by auction realized £200, but £250 is not an unusual price for a single dog, while £60, £70 and £80 are almost common. The quality old town, with its mixed Welsh, English and Flemish population, is almost the hub of the dogs' universe.—Fair News.

ALFALFA

By Milton M. Burnham.

Alfalfa should be cut as soon as one-tenth of it is in bloom, and sooner if on examination of the roots, at the places where the branches leave the crown of the roots, you find that new branches are starting. Attention to this will not only save your first crop at the time of its greatest value, but it will insure the safety of the second crop. The rule for cutting the second and third crop is the same as for the first.

After mowing hay leave it until it is wilted under and free from dew or rain water and then rake it into small windrows and put it into small cocks built without rolling the windrows and in such manner as to shed rains. Should rains occur and prevent hauling for some days, do not get alarmed and stir it out, but leave it untouched until the cocks have dried out. When about ready to haul do not spread the cocks out but turn them bottom side up an hour or more before hauling; by keeping up this process you need not fear mow burning. It will look very green so treated and will continue to look green until consumed. Further, if properly harvested and stored, neither its palatability nor digestibility is lessened by curing.

When feeding alfalfa hay it should be remembered that it is a very rich food and not as many pounds should be fed as in feeding other kinds of hay. Fed with corn stalks alternately, pound for pound a balanced ration results which will be found desirable as feed for cows, horses, stock cattle, swine and sheep. All fowls like alfalfa green or dry. As soon as you begin to feed alfalfa to horses lessen their grain ration.

Alfalfa is one of the very best foods for bees. One apiarist found that without alfalfa his colonies yield annually an average of 12 pounds, with alfalfa 70 pounds.

From years of experience in the use of alfalfa as pasture, I am satisfied that the value of alfalfa as pasture is far greater in this section, especially on dry sandy land, than any other pasture plant, and is even more valuable as pasture than hay, notwithstanding its unequalled qualities and value as hay.

However, it should not be pastured in spring until it is from four to five inches high, nor in the fall after the first severe frost. Nor should it be mowed very closely at any season.

The danger from blight in pasturing alfalfa is the same as in pasturing clover, no more or less. When first turning an animal on it, do it when it is dry, in the middle of the day, and for only an hour or less. All domestic animals will devour it ravenously as soon as they become familiar with it. In a few days there will be very little danger of blight.

If you find your stock keeping it down evenly over the field you may be sure that you are feeding it too closely and should take your stock off for awhile. On the other hand if any considerable portion is maturing, you should mow it, as during the first year.

For soiling or summer feed, it is probably that alfalfa has no equal, as relates to quality, convenience, economy, or length of season.

For feed it is customary to cut the second crop. Some seed yields in Michigan have run as high as nine bushels to the acre. The ripening of seed is said not to injure the plant for subsequent production of hay or seed.

Some object of alfalfa that it does not yield readily to other crops in a rotation. Well, one is not likely to be able to replace it with any other crop as valuable. But if used in a rotation it has been shown that there is a material increase in subsequent crops of various kinds over previous crops on the same land. It is said that shallow plowing in the fall following by deep plowing in the spring will kill it.

Next week—"Comparative Value."

There is more cancer in this section of the country than in all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. PIG FEEDING METHODS.

Importance of Water and Exercise in Getting Results.

Keep your pig on his feet sufficiently after a meal till he has digested his food by his stomach, says Professor Dietrich of the Illinois experiment station. That means to give him exercise. Keep your pig running around in the barnyard picking over manure. Make him run to the back end of the farm looking for more food. It is not good practice to feed him all he will eat anyway—keep him hungry so he will keep awake.

Water is of greater importance than dry feed—corn, for instance. It costs

The large Yorkshire breed of hogs is noted for extreme leanness and depth of loins, traits which can be taken large pieces of meat suitable for bacon. They are not as broad as the best type of hog across the shoulders, backs and loins. While not early maturing hogs, they are rapid growers and thrive well on pastures. They are good breeders, good mothers and produce large litters regularly. The illustration shows a good two-year-old sow.

practically nothing where corn costs a great deal of money. That means we should feed the pig water. Here, again, is one of the answers to the question why the fall pig does not prove so profitable, simply because the weather is cold. The cold weather does not allow the pig to drink enough water. He loses his appetite for water and won't drink enough when you give him dry feed and turn him loose at the water trough.

If the pigs won't drink enough water make the feed into a slop and make them drink it. In summer, we have the other phase of the trouble—they drink too much. The fact they drink too much in the summer is not as bad as the fact they drink too little in the winter.

Nine-tenths of all the scrubby pigs and runs are so because they are overfed and not fed properly. They are often overfed on protein. There is no quicker way to make a runt or crippled pig or to kill him in fact than to overfeed him on protein. Yet it is absolutely necessary to feed your growing pigs on protein. When they are full grown they do not need much protein.

I have spent a good share of the past six years at the station working out how to feed properly. We have published part of it in circular form—circulars 126 and 133. They give the quantities according to maximum gain—that is, when pigs are being fattened for market. One should never feed more than seven-tenths of a pound of digestible crude protein per 100 pounds live weight, between six and seven-tenths pound; for pigs going to market to have them finished at eight months old. In the case of pigs for breeding purposes I think they should be fed one-tenth less, never getting above six-tenths of a pound.

The amount of water necessary is also given in these circulars. A pig that is started at two months of age at weaning time should have twelve pounds of water for every 100 pounds of pig.

Building Up a Beef Herd.

With a good pure bred beef sire, a herd of native cows and plenty of pasture land a farmer may in two or three years' time develop a good grade beef herd, which will largely increase his profits and maintain the fertility of the soil.

Treatment For Bog Spavin.

Bog spavin of horse should be relieved by complete rest and running water from a hose on it for half an hour twice a day. If this treatment is not successful in two weeks apply a blister of Gombault's caustic balsam.

DAIRY WISDOM.

"More dairy cows, better feed and more butter fat" is a good motto for every farmer.

When one takes into consideration the difficulty in buying satisfactory cows there is little question that under nearly all conditions it pays to raise well bred heifers as a basis for maintenance and improvement of the dairy herd.

The cow eats today and she pays for her feed at tonight's milking. No other farm animal gives such prompt return for feed and labor. That is one reason why a herd of dairy cows should be on every farm.

Your winter cow is always the most profitable, and it must be remembered that she needs the best of care in order to yield most liberally.

Alfalfa and clover are the best dry feeds there are for the cow. Timothy hay is splendid to sell. The dairy cow is the foundation of all soil improvement and farm property, and no other line of farming is so well adapted to the development of the highest minded and citizenship.

GOOD ATTENDANCE AT ANNUAL MEETING

West Michigan Development Bureau at Traverse City

DIRECTORS ELECTED FOR COMING YEAR

D. S. Payton and Ford P. Robbins
Will Represent This County

Bureau the "Parent Body" and Has "Set the Pace" for Others—Great Work Done by the Bureau.

There was a very good attendance at the annual meeting of the Western Michigan Development Bureau last week, and the enthusiasm and activity manifested was refreshing. Nearly every county of the twenty in the district was represented.

President D. H. Day in his opening address said that if the same enthusiasm which was manifested last year should be shown during the coming year the successes of the past years would be greatly multiplied. He congratulated the members upon the success of the movement and commended the work of the officers. He declared that publicity was the greatest movement a body of men could engage in, and that the development bureau was the greatest organization that one could conceive. He described the Western Michigan organization as the parent body from which other organizations had sprung and that the influence of this bureau was felt in all parts of the state. "You have set the pace," he said, "and it is a splendid pace to set." President Day did not consume a great deal of time in his remarks, but proceeded at once to the real business of the meeting.

The report of Secretary John I. Gibson was filled with interest. It told a long story of effort and achievement and results.

In his introductory remarks Mr. Gibson said:

"Nearly all development movements depend largely for their success upon what they can do to influence people outside their home territory. While we believe outside exploitation and development is important, yet, results have demonstrated that development from within is vastly important. Believing, as we do, that agriculture is one of our greatest and most important industry and that it lies at the base of all human endeavor and that in the soil, the origin of all things, lies also the solution of many difficulties, we hold that to encourage co-operation between the city and the country and to educate our people in the better methods of agriculture and horticulture and to a point where they will know for themselves the advantages possessed by western Michigan, so that they will become enthusiastic, will welcome newcomers and hold out a helping hand, is the most valuable and telling work in which we can be engaged. To this end the secretary has traveled approximately 27,000 miles by railroad and over 400 miles by automobile and carriage and has visited then numerous places in the bureau's territory during the past year, in the furtherance of this propaganda for the improvement of agricultural conditions in western Michigan."

Besides the work within the district the secretary gave four illustrated lectures at Battle Creek, Kalamazoo, Benion Harbor and Lansing. In all there were seventy-five meetings during the past year, sixty of them illustrated features and twenty without views. This far 108,000 of the bureau magazines had been distributed, leaving 42,000 on hand to be distributed. The secretary spent considerable time in soliciting advertisements for the magazine in addition to his regular work. He also was active in securing the passage of the law empowering supervisors to levy a tax for advertising the counties of the state. He referred in a very complimentary manner to the free advertising and encouragement given by the newspapers in this district, which no money could buy. He referred also to the splendid publications of the county without cost. The bureau has about 350 half-ton cuts, besides innumerable photographs and several hundred slides for the illustrated lectures, including views of farms, orchards and city scenes. The secretary referred to the successful campaign in favor of alfalfa culture. During the year five exhibits have been made of western Michigan products, the Chicago land show, Michigan fairs, Grand Rapids, Lansing, Linton and Traverse City during the state grange meeting. He spoke in detail about the wonderful interest the work of the bureau had attracted in Chicago.

The treasurer's report showed receipts as follows:

In 1909, $10,015; in 1910, $10,723; in 1911, $20,000.

The expenditures for the magazines and land show exhibits were $7,720.12 in 1909 and $8,318.11 in 1910. The following directors were elected:

CHARLEVOIX SHIP YARDS

Are Gaining in Reputation for Quality in Boat Building

Louis Mercier has completed a Thirty Foot Launch for Wm. Schubert, Jr.

Louis Mercier has completed the construction of a launch for Wm. Schubert, Jr., of Cincinnati. The boat is thirty feet long and five and one-half feet wide. The hull is built of cypress and oak and has a V-out stern. The boat is finished up with mahogany and oak and has a brass band around the line to protect it from being jammed at the landing.

The boat is equipped with a Sterling engine which will develop from 10 to 25 horse power. The engine has a rear starting device and bulk-head control. The engine has a hush magnet and the tank is back of the engine hood. With a wheel of 18 inch diameter and 20 inch pitch the boat will make 15 miles an hour, as it only draws 10 inches of water.

There is an 11 foot space in the boat to carry passenger chairs, while the seats at the front and rear of the boat will be upholstered with imitation leather. An auto top will be placed on the boat and together with the numerous brass trimmings such as flag-staffs, hooks, air ventilator and engine hood hinges, will make a great pleasure boat.

Mr. Mercier did an excellent piece of work in the construction of this launch and has earned all the credit that can be given in his next execution of the design he worked out. Mr. Mercier is also building a boat for George Warner of Chicago. Both boats will be seen in Charlevoix this season.

BOARD OF EQUALIZATION

Will Meet This Year the Fourth Monday in June

Must Publish Statement of Actual Cash Value of Property.

Under the terms of the act creating a new state board of equalization the board of supervisors of the several counties must hold a special session this year on the fourth Monday in June to equalize the assessment rolls of their respective counties and prepare a report for the state board of equalization, which must be completed before the second Monday in July.

Other rather radical changes are made in the old act by the new measure, which was given immediate effect. The chairman of the state tax commission supersedes the lieutenant governor as a member of the board and the act provides for a secretary who shall be either the deputy auditor general or a clerk in that department. The tax commission is required to present to the board a statement showing the actual cash value of all real and personal property in the state, except that paying a specific tax or taxed under the ad valorem system.

The state board of equalization will meet on the third Monday in August this year and every third and fifth consecutive year thereafter instead of every five years, as the old law provided.

At the conclusion of its session the board is required to notify the treasurer of each county of the several counties and the treasurer must publish a copy of the statement in one or more newspapers in the county. The board also is authorized to publish copy of its proceedings and the statements presented by any of the counties relative to the equalization.

It is because of the proximity of the meeting of the board that the tax commission is desirous of proceeding at once with the appraisal of the mining properties. For this reason the commission is endeavoring to get around the refusal of the board of state auditors to go to the governor's office and the refusal of the executive to go to the board rooms to take up the matter of selecting an expert to aid in making the appraisal.

The commission proposes to abandon further personal interviews and endeavor to settle the question by correspondence. Governor Osborn insists the expert shall be a resident of another state and it is probable the commission will accept his suggestion to apply to the dean of the Columbia mining school for a man to aid the commission. If the auditors will agree to this plan in writing the matter will be adjourned.

MAJESTIC THEATER LEASED

To Manager Cory of Petoskey Opens Monday, May 15.

The prospects for a string of vaudeville and pictures theaters with Petoskey as headquarters now looks to be a possibility, and is given color by the announcement that Manager E. M. Cory of the People's vaudeville and the People's theater of Petoskey has leased the Majestic theater of this city.

Mr. Cory has established an enviable reputation in Petoskey and with surrounding towns for the class of attractions he has always presented to his patrons, which has always been the best obtainable and with the new house on the circuit, he will be able to draw from even a larger area of attractions.

Mr. Cory has from the start enjoyed the best patronage of this region both with home people and summer resorters. His film service is par excellence, and he has always the latest and best produced, and his pictures are shown without the distracting flicker noticeable in so many picture machines.

Mr. Cory has taken immediate possession of the Charlevoix house but will not open it until May 15 as he wishes to get it in perfect readiness, and it will require a few days to get his bookings arranged properly. There will be two changes of vaudeville acts each week, with change of pictures daily.

Charlevoix play-goers have long wanted and needed some experienced manager to operate their theater, and they have now found that person in Mr. Cory, who will fill the bill without a doubt.

BOARD OF HEALTH WARNS DOG OWNERS

To Muzzle Their Dogs and Keep Them Muzzled or Confined

OFFICERS WILL ENFORCE THE LAW

Not Warfare on Dogs, but Warfare on Mad Dogs

City has been in Torment of Mad Dog Scare Over a Year and Menace will be Stamped Out.

Section 1. It is hereby made the duty of all boards of health to whom cases of rabies among dogs are reported to immediately investigate the same by some member or members of the board; and should such investigation show a reasonable probability that a dog is infected with the disease known as rabies, the said board of health shall immediately establish such temporary quarantine as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease and to make immediate complaint thereof, in the manner provided in section four thereof.

Section 2. The said board of health, when in its judgment such action is necessary to prevent the spread of the disease, shall have power to order all dogs restrained, confined or muzzled.

Section 3. Any member of the board of health or any resident may make complaint when any dog has been bitten by or been fighting with a dog that is rabid, or has been running at large in violation of the order of the board of health.

Section 4. Any person refusing or neglecting to perform any of the duties imposed upon him by any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to the penalties prescribed by law in such cases.

Section 5. Any person violating any of the provisions of this act, or of a quarantine or regulation or order to restrain, confine or muzzle dogs, duly established or issued by the board of health as provided in this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to a fine of not less than ten dollars or more than one hundred dollars or to imprisonment in the county jail for a period of not less than ten days nor more than thirty days, or both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

Above is the law in regard to mad dogs. For over a year we have in this city been unable to tell when some dog would go mad. Our officers have tried to enforce the law, and in so doing have been unjustly criticized by many. Now it is a condition not a theory that confronts us, and the officers are determined to stamp out this menace. Dogs must be muzzled or kept in an inclosure. By enclosure it is not meant tied by a chain, which will allow them to get at other dogs, but a place where they will be completely isolated from everything.

A dog pound will be established and dogs held for forty-eight hours before killing, so any owner may redeem his dog. However if a dog is found unmuzzled a second time, the owner will be arrested and fined or both fined and imprisoned. The officers are going to do their duty and all good citizens will co-operate with them. This is not a warfare on dogs, but a warfare on mad dogs.

PREVENTION OF DUST ON ROADS

Permanent Treatment of Public Highways With Tar.

PRINCIPAL MATERIAL USED.

If Work is Properly Done a Treated Road After Being Opened For Traffic a Short While Takes an Appearance Closely Resembling Asphalt—it is Waterproof and Dustless.

Although the problem of dust prevention on public highways is by no means a new one, its importance has been greatly accentuated by the comparatively recent introduction of the automobile, says the Scientific American. The dust raising tendency of the latter is due to the destructive shearing action of the tires of the driving wheels and the intense suction and eddying producing effect of the car body in passing swiftly over surfaces which have been already loosened up by the action. In the days of the horse drawn vehicle the iron shoes of the horse and the tires had a tendency to consolidate rather than loosen up the surface of a well made macadam road, and the comparatively small amount of dust which gathered could be sufficiently laid by one or two dully trips of the watering cart. The advent of the automobile, however, has complicated the problem greatly, and it has become necessary not merely to find a more efficient means for laying the dust, but to provide also a method of road construction which will more firmly bind the road material together and enable it to stand up under the extreme conditions which the automobile has imposed.

The most valuable quality in any dust preventive is its ability to hold together the finely divided material which is produced on or near the surface of the road. The value of any oil, asphalt, emulsion or what not lies at the last analysis in its "binding power," and this quality in any dust preventive is proportionate to the amount of bituminous base which it contains.

The principal material used in the permanent treatment of roads with tar are coal tar, refined coal tar and water gas tar. They may be used effectively either by applying them to a road already finished or by incorporating them in the surface material of the road during construction. In applying the tar to an old road the surface should be thoroughly dry, comparatively warm and free from dust.

Moisture prevents the tar from proper contact with the stone, and a cold surface stiffens the material and prevents its being absorbed. Before the application is made ruts and hollows should be filled and the surface brought up to a smooth and even condition. The tar, heated to about 100 degrees F., is spread upon the road through a hose or by other suitable means and is then thoroughly broomed in.

After this has been done, to secure good results the surface treated should be closed to all traffic for about twelve hours so as to give the tar an opportunity to thoroughly sink in the surface. Next a coat of clean sand or stone chips should be applied to absorb any excess tar and dry up the surface, as it were. The road should then be rolled thoroughly to bring it into condition.

In applying the tar, in new construction the road should be formed and consolidated without the use of water. The voids should be filled with fine stone chips free from dust, and care must be taken not to roll the surface too heavily or the tar will not adhere properly. Hot tar may be applied through all of the courses as they are laid and rolled, but occasionally the upper course only is so treated. After tarring, a top dressing of material is laid on and the surface is thoroughly rolled. The tar spreading may be done either by hand, in which case an excess above what is necessary will probably be used, or it may be spread on by an apparatus mounted on wheels, the tar being discharged under pressure at the road surface by specially designed spraying nozzles.

If the work be properly done, a tarred road after being open to traffic for a short while takes on an appearance closely resembling asphalt, being smooth and firm, practically noiseless and more resilient than asphalt. It is largely waterproof, practically dustless, and the resistance to traction is less than that of an untreated macadam road.

When an accident like the following occurs right here at home, it is bound to carry weight with our readers. So many strange occurrences go the rounds of the press are published as facts, people become skeptical. On one subject skepticism is rapidly disappearing. This is due to the actual experience of our citizens, and their public utterances regarding them. The doubter must doubt no more in the face of such evidence as this. The public statement of a reputable citizen living right at home, one whom you can see every day, leaves no ground for the skeptic to stand on.

W. Wanted It Realistic. A certain New York theatrical manager is noted for the exquisite beauty of his stage settings. One day, rehearsing a moonlight scene, he found fault with the moon. First the moon was too bright, then it was too dull. Now its beams were too yellow and now they were too pale. Finally, after holding up the rehearsal for twenty minutes, the manager tore out in a great rage to arrange the moon himself. On the stage a pause ensued. During the pause the leading lady said wearily to the villain: "Oh, dear! What are we waiting for now?" "Nothing much," the villain answered. "The boss wants a real moon, and he's gone to fetch it, that's all."

"Well, I discharged my boss last night." "Discharged your boss?" "Yep—in a dream." "They say dreams go by 40 miles." "That's what I found this morning when the boss said good-by." Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary, G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass., surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reinforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. In size of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

What makes a Cream Separator good or bad

It takes something besides cast iron, red paint and hot air to make a separator that will skim milk clean twice a day 365 days in the year for 15 or 20 years.

If some of the farmers who are thinking of buying a cream separator this season, and have been half persuaded by extravagant advertising to "save one-third the cost" by buying a machine of the "Just-as-good-as-the-DE LAVAL" or the "mail order" kind, could only listen to the experience of a few of the thousands of the users of such machines who have traded them in for DeLaval's during the past year, they would be forcibly reminded of the old adage which runs "Save at the spout and waste at the bung-hole."

We have a Separator that skims 750 pounds, warranted for 5 years, for $50. See us before buying.

THE FORTUNE HUNTER

Novelized by

WINCHELL SMITH

Kellogg's responsive pressure was answer enough. "It makes it doubly worth while to win out and have you all so glad," he said.

"So you've taken him into the firm, eh?" Duncan inquired of Bartlett.

The blue eyes widened slowly. "The governor has I'm not in the business, y' know. Never had the slightest turn for it, what?" Willy set aside his glass. "I say, I must be moving. No, I can't stop. Kellogg, really, I was dressed at the club and Larry told me about it, so I just dropped round to tell you how jolly glad I am."

"Your father hadn't told you, then?"

"Who, the governor?" Willy looked unutterably bored. "Why, he gave up trying to talk business with me long ago. I can't get interested in it, 'pon my word. Of course I knew he thought the deuce and all of you, but I hadn't an idea they were going to take you into the firm. What?"

Long and Miller interrupted, proposing adieu which Kellogg vainly contended.

"Why, you're only just here"—he expostulated.

"Can't help it, old chap," Willy assured him earnestly. "I must go, any way. I've a dinner engagement."

"You'll be late, won't you?"

"Doesn't matter in the least. I'm always late. Night, Kellogg. Congratulations again."

"We just dropped round to take off our hats to you," Long continued, pumping Kellogg's hand.

"And tell you what a good fellow we think you are," added Miller, following suit.

"You don't know how good you make me feel," Kellogg told them.

Under cover of this diversion Duncan was making one last effort to slip away, but before he could gather together his impedimenta and get to the door Willy Bartlett intercepted him.

"I say, Duncan—"

"Oh, rats," said Duncan beneath his teeth. He paused ungraciously enough.

"We've got to see a bit of one another, now we've met again, y' know. Wish you'd look me up. Half moon club 'll get me most any time. We'll have to arrange to make a regular old fashioned night of it, just for memory's sake."

Duncan nodded, edging past him. "I've memories enough," he said.

"Right off! Any reason at all, y' know, just so we have the night?"

"Good enough," assented Duncan vaguely. He suffered his hand to be wrung with warmth. "I'll not forget. Good night." Then he pulled up and groaned, for Willy's insistence had frustrated his design. Kellogg had suddenly become alive to his attitude and hailed him over the heads of Long and Miller.

"Nah, I say! Where the devil are you going?"

"Over to the hotel," said Duncan. "The deuce you are! What hotel?"

"The one I'm stopping at."

"Not on your life. You're not going just yet. I haven't had half a chance to talk to you. Robbins, take Mr. Duncan's things."

Duncan, set upon by Robbins, who had been hovering round for just that purpose, lifted his shoulders in resignation, turning back into the room as Miller and Long said good night to him and left at Bartlett's heels, and smiled away in semi-humorous depression of the way in which he let Kellogg outmaneuver him. When it came to that it was hard to refuse Kellogg anything; he had that way with him, especially if one liked him. And how could any one help liking him?

Kellogg had him now, bolding him fast by either shoulder, at arm's length, and abating a reproving head at his friend. "You big duffer!" he said. "Did you think for a minute I'd let you throw me down like that? Have you died?"

At this suggestion Duncan stiffened and fell back. "No, but—"

Kellogg swept the ground from under his feet. "Robbins," he told the man, "order in dinner for two from the club, and tell 'em to hurry it up."

"Yes, sir," said Robbins, and flew to obey before Duncan could get a chance to countermand his part in the order.

"And now," continued Kellogg, "we've got the whole evening before us in which to chin. Sit down." He led Duncan to an armchair and gently but firmly plumped him into its spacious depths. "We'll have a snug little dinner here and what do you say to taking in a show afterward?"

"I say no."

"You dunder, my boy. This is the night we celebrate. I'm feeling pretty good tonight."

"You ought to, Harry," Duncan struggled to rouse himself to share in the spirit of gratulation with which Kellogg was bubbling. "I'm mighty glad, old man. It's a great step up for you."

"It's all of that. You could have knocked me over with a feather when Bartlett sprang it on me this morning. Of course, I was expecting something, a boost in salary, or something like that. Bartlett knew that other bosses in the street had made me offers. I've been pretty lucky of late and pulled off one or two rather big deals, but a partnership with L. J. Bartlett—think of it, Nat!"

"I'm thinking of it, and it's great."

"It'll keep me mighty busy," Kellogg blundered blithely on. "It means a lot of extra work, but you know I like to work."

"That's right, you do," agreed Duncan cheerily. "It's queer to me. It must be a great thing to like to work."

"You bet it's a great thing. Why, I couldn't stand if I couldn't work. You remember that time I laid off for a month in the country for my health's sake? I'll never forget it—banging round all the time with my hands empty—every one else with something to do. I wouldn't go through with it again for a fortune. Never felt so useless and in the way."

"But," interrupted Duncan, knitting his brows as he grappled with this problem, "you were independent, weren't you? You had money—could pay your board?"

"Of course. Nevertheless I felt in the way."

"That's funny."

"It's straight."

"I know it is. It wouldn't be you if you didn't love work. It wouldn't be me if I did. Look here, Harry. Suppose you didn't have any money and couldn't pay your board and had nothing to do. How'd you feel in that case?"

"I don't know. Anyhow that's not—"

"No, it isn't not. I'm trying to make you understand how I feel when—when it's that way with me, as it generally is." He raised one hand and let it fall with a gesture of despondency so eloquent that it roused Kellogg out of his own preoccupation.

"Why, Nat?" he cried, genuinely sympathetic. "I've been so taken up with myself that I forgot. I hadn't looked for you till tomorrow."

"You knew, then?"

"I met Atwater at lunch today. He told me. Said he was sorry, but—"

"Yes, everybody is always sorry, but—"

Kellogg let his hand fall on Duncan's shoulder. "I'm sorry, too, old man. But don't lose heart. I know it's pretty tough on a fellow."

"The toughest part of it is that you got the job for me, and I had to fall down."

"Don't think of that. It's not your fault."

"You're the only man who believes that, Harry."

"Buck up. I'll stumble across some better opening for you before long, and—"

"Stop right there. I'm through."

"Don't talk that way, Nat. I'll get you in right somewhere."

"You're the best hearted man alive, Harry, but I'll see you blasted first."

"Wait." Kellogg demanded his attention. "Here's this man Burnham. You don't know him, but he's as keen as they make 'em. He's on the track of some wonderful scheme for making illuminating gas from crude oil. If it goes through, it's bound to work a revolution. He's down in Washington now—left this afternoon to look up the patents. Now, he needs me to get the ear of the Standard Oil people, and I'll get you in there."

"What right 've you got to do that?" demanded Duncan. "What the dickens do I know about illuminating gas or crude oil? Burnham'd never thank you for the likes o' me."

"But, thunder, you can learn. All you need—"

"Now, see here, Harry!" Duncan gave him pause with a manner not to be denied. "Once and for all time understand I'm through having you recommend an incompetent just because we're friends."

"But, Harry—"

"And I'm through living on you while I'm out of a job. That's final."

"But, man, listen to me—when we were at college—"

"That was another matter."

"How many times did you pay the room rent when I was strapped? How many times did your money pull me through when I'd have had to quit and forfeit my degree because I couldn't earn enough to keep on?"

"That's different. You earned enough finally to square up. You don't owe me anything."

"I owe you the gratitude for the friendly hand that put me in the way of earning—that kept me going when the going was rank. Besides, the conditions are just reversed now; you'll do just as I did—make good in the world and, when it's convenient, to me. As for living here, you're perfectly welcome."

"I know it—and more," Duncan assented a little wearily. "Don't think I don't appreciate all you've done for me. But I know and you must understand that I can't keep on living on you—and I won't."

For once baffled, Kellogg stared at him in consternation. Duncan met his gaze steadily, strong in the sincerity of his attitude. At length Kellogg surrendered, accepting defeat. "Well"—he shrugged uncomfortably. "If you insist."

"I do."

"Then that's settled."

"Yes, that's settled."

"Dinner," said Robbins from the doorway, "is served."

CHAPTER III

AFTER dinner they smoked and talked about Duncan's future. Finally Kellogg said solemnly:

"Harry, if you follow my advice you can be worth a million dollars in a year!"

"Let him rave," Duncan observed enigmatically and began to smoke.

"No, I'm not dining, and I'm perfectly serious."

"Of course. But what'd they do to me if I were caught?"

"This is not a joke. The proposition is perfectly legal. It's being done right along."

"And I could do it, Harry?"

"A man of your caliber couldn't fail."

"Would you mind ringing for Robbins?" Duncan asked abruptly.

"Certainly," Kellogg pressed a button at his elbow. "What'd you want?"

"A straitjacket and a doctor to tell which one of us needs it."

Kellogg, chagrined as he always was if joked with when expounding one of his schemes, broke into a laugh that lasted until Robbins appeared.

"You rang, sir?"

"Yes. Put those decanters over here, and some glasses, please."

"Yes, sir."

The man obeyed and withdrew. Kellogg filled two glasses, handing one to Duncan.

"Now be decent and listen to me, Nat. I've thought this thing over for—oh, any amount of time. I'll bet anything it will work. What'd you say? Would you like to try it?"

"Would I like to try it?" A conviction of Kellogg's earnestness forced itself upon Duncan's understanding. "Would I?" He lifted his glass and drained it at a gulp. "Why, that's the first lunch I've had for a month!"

"Then I'll tell you—"

Duncan placed a pleading hand on his forehead.

"Don't kid me, Harry," he entreated. "Not a bit of it. This is straitjacket goods. If you want to try it and will follow the rules I lay down, I'll guarantee you'll be a rich man inside of twelve months."

"Rules! Man, I'll follow all the rules in the world! Come on, I'm getting palpitation of the heart, waiting. Tell it to me, what've I got to do?"

"Marry," said Kellogg serenely.

"Marry?" Duncan echoed, aghast.

"Marry," reaffirmed the other with unbroken gravity.

"Marry who?"

"A girl with a fortune. You see, I can't guarantee the precise size of her pile. That all depends on luck and the locality. But it'll run anywhere from several hundred thousand up to a million, perhaps more."

Duncan sank back despondently. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Harry," he said dully. "You had me all excited for a minute."

"No, but honestly, I mean what I say."

"Now look here, do you really think any girl with a million would take a chance on me?"

"She'll jump at it."

Duncan thought this over for a while. Then his lips twitched. "What's the matter with her?" he inquired.

"I'm willing to play the game as it lies, but I have lunatics and cripples."

"There's no particular her, yet. You can take your pick. I've no more idea where she is than you have."

"Now I know you're stark, staring, gibbering!"

"Not a bit of it. I'm inspired, that's all. I've solved your problem; you only can't believe it."

"How could I? What the devil are you getting at, anyhow?"

"This pet scheme of mine. Lend me your ears. Have you ever lived in a one horse country town, a place with one unspeakable hotel and about twenty stores and five churches?"

"No."

"I have. I was born in one of 'em. Have you any idea what becomes of the young people of such towns?"

"Not a glimmering."

"Then, I'll enlighten your egregious density. The boys—those who've got the stuff in them—strike out for the cities to make their everlasting fortunes. Generally they do it too."

"The same as you?"

"The same as me," assented Kellogg, unperturbed. "But the yaps, the Japs, stay there and clerk in father's store. After office hours they put on their very best nail order clothes and parade up and down Main street, talking loud and drinking obviously with the girls. The girls haven't much else to do. They don't find it so easy to get away. A few of 'em escape to boarding schools and colleges, where they meet and marry young men from the cities, but the majority of them have to stay at home and help mother. That's a tradition. If there are two children or more the boys get the 'chance every time.' The girls stay home to comfort the old folks in their old age. Why, by the time they're old

THEATRICAL

Charlevoix theater goers will soon have the opportunity of seeing Alvin Villars as "Easy Going Jim." Edna Cordair and Jane Sylvester in "Jim and the Singer." The play will have four special features, including Edna Cordair in her latest hits. Manager of Detroit, Ohio circuit of theaters, says, on February 28, 1911:

"The play is full of good comedy and excitement. Act four received three curtain calls. Act four reached the climax of dramatic intensity which was unexpectedly changed to hilarious comedy by Villars' drill wit and mimicry as 'Easy Going Jim.' Mrs. Cordair's 'smile' was fine and her specialities excellent. The company was good. Mr. Sylvester was especially so as the first."

This popular play will be seen in this city at the Charlevoix theater, May 25, at popular prices.

F. M. Cory of Petoskey stated Monday to the Courier that he would come to this city, with one of the best managers that exist in this community, when he opens the Majestic theater, Monday, May 15. High class vaudeville will be seen here and the one thing Mr. Cory promises us is that we will not see anything but good people and clean acts. Mr. Cory's reputation in Petoskey and surrounding territory should convince the people of an honest, square deal at this popular play house. Mr. Cory left Tuesday to complete looking arrangements in Chicago and will be back Friday to complete the house work here. If Mr. Cory promises anything he will live up to his promise and you can depend on it.

A HAUNTED ROOM.

The Mysterious Light That George Cary Eggleston Defied.

There was and perhaps still is a room in a certain house in Virginia which was supposed to be haunted. Every time a person slept there he would be sure to wake after awhile to find the whole room pervaded by a dim yellowish gray or grayish yellow light. It was very dim at first, but it increased steadily till the occupant of the chamber fled from the nameless terror in panic. Mr. George Cary Eggleston was not to be daunted by these tales and accordingly decided to try a night there. In "Recollections of a Varied Life" he tells what happened.

It was about midnight when I entered the room. It was raining heavily, and the wind was rattling the stout shutters of the eight great windows of the room.

I went to each of those windows and minutely examined it. They were hung with heavy curtains of deep red. Having completed my examination, I explored the chamber and bolted the door. I went to bed. The bed was a post-r was I suppose comfortable and the sign of a good night of the rain as it beat upon the window blinds was as soothing as a lullaby. I forgot all about the legend in which I was engaged, till, at one o'clock and, their wings, and their feet.

After a time I suddenly started by that yellow light which I had seen in the legends of old. I was startled by the sight of a dim yellow light which had crept into the room. My awakening was so sudden that all my faculties were in a state of confusion. I felt under my pillow and found the pistol still where I had put it.

Instead of reaching hastily for the pistol, I lay there a time, waiting the light. It was dim, almost imperceptible, but it was there. I decided to wait until the light should be more in evidence and its persistence would be a sure sign of the light.

The light was still beating heavily against the wall. I was still slowly but steadily increasing. I was resolved, however, in my determination not to be disturbed or hurried by any manifestation. In response to that determination I glanced at the mirror and decided that the mysterious light was sufficient for the purpose, and I resolved I would leave.

Having done so, I bathed in the rapidly increasing light. I was deliberate, however, in donning my clothing, and not till I was fully dressed did I turn to leave the room.

I turned the key. A second later I was out of that chamber, and the door of it was securely shut behind me. I went down the great stairway, slowly, deliberately, in pursuance of my resolution. I entered the large hallway below and thence passed to the oak-paneled dining room, where I sat down to breakfast with the rest of the company.

It was a check of a dark, rainy morning. The grayish yellow light was daylight.

Harmony in the Leaves of a Tree. One of the remarkable characteristics of a tree is the process of leafing, and if we examine the leaves upon which the leaves grow, the admiration of the scientific agriculturist will become thoroughly aroused over the perfect consistency and artistic skill manifested in the arrangement of each spray and the exact number of leaves arranged with the most exquisite art and regularity. Every group of leaves forms merely long lines, no two alike, no two in the same position, yet all so perfect and harmoniously blended that there can be no antagonism, no sameness, and all these thousands and thousands of strange and delicate forms grouped together, neither confused nor ill arranged.

Notice to Dog Owners.

All dogs found without muzzles will be impounded. If not claimed in 48 hours, they will be killed. Dogs must either be kept in an enclosure that cannot be entered by other animals or muzzled. Fencing by chain is not sufficient protection. Any dog owner whose dog is taken up twice unmuzzled will be arrested.

A. Five cents per dozen for eggs, 2 cents per pound for fowls. This is generally paid with the express charges.

Q. My Leghorns have very yellow ear lobes. They are vigorous, lay freely and were sold to me for pure bred stock. Is this color a sign of mixed blood?

Q. What does the word "furnished" mean when applied to a fowl?

A. Q. About what temperature is best for an incubator room? Should incubator eggs be kept in a light or dark room?

A. Sixty to 70 degrees. Dark room the better.

Q. About how many changes a week should I make the brooder heat?

A. If you start at 100 degrees a reduction of 5 degrees per week is all right. The vigor of your stock being always considered, but brooder heat should never stand below 70 degrees.

FEATHERS AND EGGSHELLS.

Many fail to win at shows because they start conditioning fowls too late. This should begin in time for fowls to catch up to standard weight, replace broken feathers and become perfectly tame.

Many have often wondered whether Peter lost his appetite for chicken after his experience with the cock that grew thick. Not so if we judge him by his successors.

Judge Saylors of Salisbury, Pa., advised a husband who was before him for non-support to have roven and go back to the farm. Yes, you seldom see the man that sticks to the farm to care of his poultry.

A turkey, but at Albany, Pa., after a long season of poultry raising, two of the four fowls and a capon, raised them. For the first time they beat all the best birds of the season on the farm. Why? Because their Turkey keeps her young a way from the farm and follows nature's plan.

A friend paid $200 for stock and made a total of his first year because he was sold without birds. His poultry raised and raised this advertise near the chicken presented his case and got a sure loan with a lump of sugar in it.

If you think snow can take the place of water just set some down in a pan at night, when chickens have had only snow all day. They almost drink their food out of it. Water is a great tonic for fattening, and chickens gain much less when they must melt snow to eat their food.

Why some dirty, who is often explained after the show by their state-mints before. They are too cocksure. A fellow is seldom kicked by a cat because his business and is so well advertised by his how-how-how. Like a gun, you don't know when a show is loaded till it goes off.

Much of the poultry grit on the market is inferior because it wears smooth in the gizzard. The best is true crystal. It keeps its cutting edge and, though it breaks up finely in the grinding process, is sharp to the last. We have tested much salt, washed and left in certain brands of cracked oyster shell. This shows it was not washed before grinding. You not only thus pay for waste, but excess salt is apt to cause inflammation in the hen's digestive tract.

You should by all means have a compressed air sprayer for annihilation of fruit tree pests, and what a convenience for destroying mites in a henhouse and for whitewashing! Friend, save time, labor and gray hairs by using labor saving machinery.

MET FIRST DEFEAT

Charlevoix Loses Game to Strong Northport Team

Effect of Trip and Slow Ground Himperted Home Team.

The Charlevoix high school baseball team met its first defeat of the season at the hands of the strong Northport team. The defeat was due principally to the fact that the Northport players were more efficient at the game in fielding, running bases and hitting, but there were other causes which entered in. Their ground was very slow compared to the one our boys had been accustomed to playing on and the trip over there placed a number in not the best kind of a mood for playing base ball. Considering the fact that Northport has already beaten Traverse and Cadillac, the Charlevoix team played a good game of ball. Northport will home to Charlevoix for a return game one week from Saturday. Saturday the boys go to Harbor Springs. Do not forget the game a week from Saturday.

Neighborhood Notes

At the meeting of the Michigan association of schools boards and superintendents held in Lansing April 20 and 21, the discussion of the free text book question was of great interest and many facts were brought out which the general public ought to know. Judge Carpenter read a very interesting and instructive paper on this topic. Undoubtedly, much discussion was brought out on account of the Young-Straight uniformity bill which passed the house on greased skids the last minute, and came very near being railroaded through the senate, but was headed off by superintendents, commissioners and school officers who saw the danger of such legislation, and flooded the senate with telegrams of protest, hence, the sentiment of the meeting was decidedly against uniformity. The superintendent from Muskegon made the statement that during the past ten years free text books for all grades below the high school had cost an average of 34 cents per capita per year, and Superintendent E. C. Warriner of Saginaw stated that the average annual per capita for a period of 25 years for the city of Saginaw, high school and grades, had been fifty cents. He further stated that the cost of free text books was only two per cent of the operating expenses. Certainly this showing would favor free text books, purchased by the board as other apparatus, at a low price. These figures should be given serious thought by the public, because the purchasing of school books, is a big problem with many families, and free text books will certainly reduce that cost to the minimum, and get just as good books.

Sheriff Edgerton made a trip to Wolverine, Tuesday for the purpose of arresting Henry Pidgeon, a resident of that place, who voted in Petoskey at the last election, for illegal voting. The man had likewise registered in Petoskey, and swore in his vote election day, claiming to have resided in the city for twenty days, while he is alleged to have only been here about ten days. The arrest was made on complaint of Dr. G. A. Parmeter, the vote having been challenged on election day, and Pidgeon was taken before Justice Krieger, who allowed him an extension of ten days to give the attorney an opportunity to decide whether to have a hearing or have the case bound over to the circuit court. Pidgeon was placed under one hundred dollar bonds, which was furnished by Herbert Hamill. —Petoskey Evening News.

The Watkins bill signed by the governor extends the length of the hunting season for deer from October 15 to November 30. For rabbit the season is from October 15 to March 1; quail and partridge, from October 15 to November 30; ducks, snipe and woodcock, geese and brant, from October 15 to December 31; spring duck shooting, from March 2 to April 10; teal and mallard, from September 15 to December 31.

The shooting of squirrels is prohibited until 1914. The game warden department states that the new law repeals the provision in the old act which protected quail until 1913, that therefore this fine field bird may be shot next fall. They are plentiful and if cold rain this spring do not kill the young there will be splendid shooting next fall.

Auditor General Fuller has given out the information that the primary apportionment per capita will reach at least seven dollars when the apportionment is made this month. The number of school children in state is 111,000 more this year than last. Approximately $5,000,000 will be distributed among the various school districts of the state. The per capita this year will be the largest since the 1900 apportionment, when the amount exceeded $12 per capita. The actual number of school children in the state on which the per capita will be based is given at 771,475.

Disregarding orders to bring in more pistol caps to school a Cadillac boy was spanked by the teacher. The spanking was administered to the most favorite portion of the youth's anatomy for that purpose. But unfortunately he had hidden a box of the caps in a pocket which was accidentally touched off from the rear. The warning the youth received from the resulting emudge caused by the explosion of the caps may compel him to dine off the mantlepiece for a couple of days. —Cadillac News.

Charles F. Ruggles, millionaire lumberman of Manchester, ate dinner with "Grandma" White at Walbrunjunction a few days ago and gave her a $500 check in payment therefor. The old lady had her restaurant destroyed by fire recently and since has been using an old box car.

Thomas Hansberger of Monroe, cleared up $400 in 1910 from his sheep raising operations in Western Michigan. He has better than 800 acres of cut over land in the eastern part of Grand Traverse county which he uses for pasture purposes during the summer season. He brings his sheep to the ranch by rail, in the spring, and ships them to market and to southern Michigan in the fall.

According to the Lake City Plain Dealer, Prosecuting Attorney E. C. Smith of Kalkaska county has commenced an action against Missaukee county for legal services. Mr. Smith assisted the Missaukee county prosecutor in the Nedro murder trial, and his bill when presented to the board of supervisors was chopped in two in the middle and a slice cut off the remainder. The Kalkaska prosecutor proposes to see how the courts will view the matter.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

There has perhaps, never been a session of the Michigan legislature before in which more desperate assaults were made by the liquor interests than the one which closed on April 10. Many attorneys of the state were retained to represent them and spent days lobbying in behalf of various measures which they sought to have enacted. Among the more important bills was the Fitzgerald small unit option bill, the real purpose of which was to repeal the county local option law. The bill as drafted would have made it practically impossible to have operated under its provisions in securing the abolition of saloons by townships, villages and cities. Former Representative Galbraith, an attorney from the northern peninsula, spent several weeks lobbying for this bill.

Another of the more important measures was the bill to permit breweries to operate in dry counties. Mr. George Nichols, an attorney from Ionia, was the lobbyist employed to urge the passage of this measure. It is currently reported that he was to receive a fee of eight thousand dollars had he succeeded in securing the passage of this bill. It at one time looked as though it might pass, as friends of the measure claimed to have one of enough votes to insure its enactment. They never dared to bring it to a test vote, however, so whether this was the fact or not cannot positively be known.

Of the minor measures was the Ewing bill to give saloonkeepers now in the business preference in the granting of licenses, thereby creating a property value in the saloon license; the Collins bill to change the provisions of the law regarding the proximity of a saloon to a church or schoolhouse; and the Newton bill to require those serving notices on saloonkeepers not to sell drink to persons commonly called posted men to serve with the notice a photograph of the man to be posted. Few men who are in the class where their wives or their children are compelled to prevent the sale of liquor to them would have photographs, so that this measure would have worked a great hardship.

A great many other bills of lesser importance and which received less consideration were introduced. Paid canvassers covered the entire state in soliciting signatures to petitions in behalf of the Fitzgerald bill alone. It is impossible to estimate how much money was expended by the liquor men in urging these measures, yet not one of them was successful.

The Martz Holiday bill was the only liquor bill to pass. This was the only liquor bill to pass. This we succeeded in having amended in the senate, however, in such a way that it gives more advantages to the temperance people than to the saloons. Its original purpose was to permit saloons to open on practically all holidays, but one after another was eliminated until the only days left for opening are the three minor holidays of Columbus day, Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays. On the other hand, any township board, village or city council may by a majority vote exclude the saloons. In addition, this it is now impossible to establish wholesale liquor houses as su-lions in any township, village or city having a population of less than two thousand.

The law governing the sales of by druggists in dry counties was so amended as to make the physician writing a prescription in bad faith criminally responsible for his acts.

On the whole the temperance people of Michigan have great reason to be satisfied over the outcome of the legislative session. Reforms have been granted in those places where it was most needed and no particular objectionable legislation has been enacted. It twice became necessary to appeal to the ministers of the state for petitions of protest, and the responses were both speedy and effective. —American Issue.

LAWS FOR BELGIAN PAINTERS

Restrictions Regarding Intoxicants and Employers' Responsibilities.

Belgium has just drawn up a special code of laws governing painters and the exercise of their craft, which are singularly strict and exhaustive.

From the fashion in which the new laws hedge them in with enforced precautions one would think painting the most dangerous trade in the whole catalogue. In the first place no employer of painters may employ a man who drinks alcoholic beverages to the temporary extinction of his logical power, and no intoxicating liquors are to be brought into the vicinity of the workers. Employers are responsible for the care which their men take of their persons.

They must see that every painter washes his hands before eating, suspend the men whose health is not satisfactory and discharge any one suffering from lead poisoning. A painter may not wear the same clothes on the street or in his home which he uses in his trade. He is imperatively required to arm himself with a special suit of clothes and a screwed hat.

Contractors and master painters are restricted in the use of white lead to the ground lead mixed with oil, and it is stipulated that this mixture must be so handled that it does not splash or come in contact with the painter's hands.

The law strictly forbids scraping of dry painted surfaces in which white lead has been used. This will doubtless prevent much carelessness and protect the careless painter from his own indiscretion, but it is terribly restrictive and smacks of overlegislation.

A Doubtful Compliment. The popularity of Tolstoy often brought him into content situations which he himself would tell about afterward. One incident, noted in P. A. Sergeyenko's "How Tolstoy Lives and Works," will bear repetition.

One day in Moscow he was walking along a narrow sidewalk when an intoxicated man crawled, staggering along, to meet him. When the stranger caught sight of Leo Nikolayevitch he came to anchor, as it were, and with twisting tongue inquired: "Count Tolstoy-yes?"

"Yes."

"I am your adorer and imitator," said the fellow, with feeling, and respectfully made way for his exemplar.

Farm and Garden

TRACTION PLOW MAKES GOOD

Saves Time, Money and Horses and is Gaining Ground Rapidly.

The traction plow saves time, money and horses. It is steadily gaining ground on its merits. Rapidly it is doing away the prejudice that has led farmers unacquainted with its power to assume that it is impracticable in the average field. Its real worth is asserting itself convincingly in actual work. Where it has been given adequate opportunity to become a part of the regular farm equipment and to fall in line with the regular routine work of the season it has made itself indispensable, says the Freeborn Gazette.

Men used to say that such an improvement was a preposterous impossibility.

ENGLISH STEAM PLOW

ly in the small field. It would take half the time to turn around in. The work of turning up a rough job of work would cost more than to do the whole thing with horses. Reasoning stubbornly in this vein, some farmers still argue to themselves that the four horse gang plow is too big for them to use. Hoping close to their mind's eye the thought of the slow turning and the dog eared corners, the outside strip and the dead furrows to be ditched with the small plow, they blind themselves to the machine's accomplishments. Perhaps an hour may be lost in dragging the single plow about in plowing on the corners, but what is that compared with the days and days saved in covering the bulk of the field?

Good Land Going to Waste.

Kansas farmers are wasting hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of good land, according to J. B. Koontz, general freight agent of the Santa Fe. Along the line of his road, Mr. Koontz says, there are 25,000 acres of land covered with useless straw stacks. Mr. Koontz figures that if the ground occupied by the straw was sown to wheat every year the yield on a fifteen hundred acreage would be 375,000 bushels. At a cent a bushel, the crop from the straw area alone would bring $375,000.

Humus is a necessary element of fertile soil. The best way to put it into the soil is to follow the system of crop rotation which shall include clover or alfalfa. In addition to this all the stable manure should be put back on to the soil and a liberal supply of straw should be used in bedding, to save the liquid manure.

Dairy Doings.

While bran can be used with a decided advantage in milking up the rations of the dairy cows, it should not be used to excess, as it will make the cream hard to churn, while the butter will be pale rather than a golden yellow.

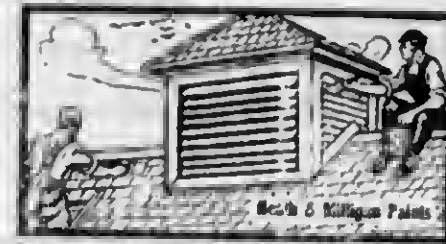

The purchaser of a bull should select an animal that is a good individual and whose dam and grandam on his sire's side, have good butter fat records. His sire must, of course, show the characteristics of the good dairy type.

Many of the Maine farmers who gave up cows and went into potato growing a few years ago are coming back to cow keeping.

A testing unit does not cost much, and it pays dividends. A cow that is merely boarding will eat as much as one producing a profit, and the only way to distinguish between the two is through the use of the Babcock test and the scales.

A farmer who has been traveling in Switzerland and Germany noticed that cows were used quite commonly for drawing loads or plowing on the little farms of those countries. He found that the cows could be worked to a moderate extent without much reducing their milk yield, and he suggests that the idea might be proved at for small farmers in other regions.

The rule for feeding grain to the University of Wisconsin experiment station dairy herd is to give six many pounds of grain as that cow produces pounds of butter fat per week.

enough to think of marrying—and they begin young, for that's about the only excitement they find available—you won't find a small country town between here and the Mississippi where there aren't about four girls to every boy."

"It's a horrible thought."
"You'd think so if you knew what the boys were like. There isn't one in ten that a girl with any sense or self respect could force herself to marry."

"I KNEW THERE WAS A CATCH IN IT, SOMEWHERE."
If she ever saw anything better. Do you begin to see my drift?"

"I do not. But go on drifting."

"Nat. Why the demand for eligible males is 300 per cent in excess of the supply. Don't you know—no, you don't; I got to that first—that there are twenty times as many old maids in small country towns as there are in the cities? It's a fact, and the reason for it is because when they were young they couldn't lower themselves to accept the pick of the local matrimonial market. Now, do you see?"

"You're as interesting as a magazine serial. Please continue in your next. I wait with anticipation."

"You're an ass. Now take a young chap from a city, with a good appearance, more or less a gentleman, who doesn't talk like a yep or walk like a yep or dress like a yep or act like a yep, and throw him into such a town long enough for the girls to get acquainted with him. He simply can't lose; can't fail to cop out the best looking girl with the biggest bank roll in town. I tell you, there's nothing to it!"

"It's wonderful to listen to you, Harry."

"I'm talking horse sense, my son. Now cash your horse—down on your neck, don't know how to earn a decent living, refusing to accept anything from your friends, ready (you say) to do almost anything to get some money. And think of the country heiresses with plenty of money far too, pining away in—innocuous demure—hundreds of them. Fine, straight, good girls, girls you could easily fall in love with, sighing their lives away for the lack of the likes of you. Now, why not take one, Nat—when you come to consider it, it's your duty—marry her and her bank roll, make her happy, make yourself happy, and live a contented life on the sunny side of Easy Street for the rest of your natural born days? Can't you see it now?"

"Yes," Duncan admitted, half persuaded of the possibility of the scheme. "I see, and I admire immensely the intellect that conceived the notion, Harry, but I can't help thinking there must be a catch in it somewhere."

"Not if you follow my instructions," Duncan drew a deep breath, sat back and looked Kellogg over very critically.

"If I didn't know you so well, Harry," said Duncan slowly, "I'd be certain you were mad. I'm not at all sure that I'm sane. It's a very idiotic, and it's a pretty damned rank thing to do to start deliberately out to marry a woman for her money. But I've been through a little hell of my own in my time, and it's not alluring to contemplate a return to it. There's nothing mad enough nor bad enough to stop me. What've I got to do?"

Kellogg beamed his triumph. "You'll try it on, then?"

"I'll try anything on. It's a contemptible, low lived piece of business, but good may come of it; you can't tell. What've I got to do?"

Slipping back, Kellogg knitted his fingers and stared at the ceiling, analyzing faintly to himself as he enumerated the conditions that first appealed to his understanding as essentials toward success.

"First pick out your town, one of 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants, no larger. I'd suggest at a hazard guess some place in the interior of Pennsylvania."

Most of such towns have at least one rich man with a marriageable daughter—but we'll make sure of that before we settle on one. Of course any suburban town is barred."

"How so?"

"Oh, they don't count. The girls always know people in the city—can get there easily. That spoils the game."

"How about the game laws?"

"I'm coming to them. Of course there isn't an open or close season, and the hunting's always good, but there are a few precautionary measures to be taken if you want to be sure of bagging an heiress. You want like most of 'em."

"Like 'em? I'll live by them!"

"Well, here come the things you mustn't do. You mustn't swear or use

"YOU'LL TRY IT ON, THEN?"

slang; you mustn't smoke and you mustn't drink."

"Heavens! Are these people as ludicrous as all that?"

"Worse than that. It might be fatal if you were ever seen in the hotel bar. And, to begin with, you must refuse all invitations of any sort, whether to dances, parties, church socials or even Sunday dinners."

"Why Sunday dinners?"

"Because Sunday's the only day you'll be invited. Dinner on weekdays is from 12 to 12:30, and it's strictly a business matter, no time for guests. But you needn't fret. They won't ask you (I'll they've sized you up pretty carefully."

"Oh?"

"Moreover, you must be very particular about your dress. It must be absolutely faultless, but very quiet. Clothing sober, dark grays and blacks and plain, but the very last word as to cut and fit. And everything must be in keeping, the very best of shirts, collars, ties, hats, socks, shoes, underwear."

Kellogg caught Duncan's look and laughed. "Your laundress will report an everything, you know, so you must be impeccable."

"I'll be even that, whatever it is."

"Be very particular about having your shoes polished, shave daily and manœuvre yourself religiously, but don't let 'em catch you at it."

"Would they raid me if they did?"

"And then, my son, you must work."

Kellogg paused to let his lesson sink in. After a time Duncan observed plaintively, "I knew there was a catch in it somewhere. What kind of work?"

"It doesn't make any difference, so long as you get and hold some job in the town."

"Well, that lets me out. You'll have to sic some other poor devil on this glittering proposition of yours. I couldn't hold a job in—"

"Wait! I'll tell you how to do it in just a minute."

"I don't mind listening, but—"

"You'll clinch the whole business by going to church without a break. Don't ever fail—morning and evening, every Sunday. Don't forget that."

"Why?"

"It's the most important thing of all."

"Does going to church make such a bit with the young female Jasper—the Jasperette, as it were?"

"It'll make you more solid than anything else with her popper and mammer, and that's very necessary when you're a candidate for their daughter. You must work and you must go to church."

"That can't be all. Surely you can think of something else."

"These are the cardinal rules—church and work until you've landed your heiress. After that you can move back to civilization. Now, as soon as you strike, your town you want to make arrangements far board and lodging in some old woman's house, preferably an old maid. You'll be sure to find at least half a dozen of 'em willing to take boarders, but you want to be equally sure to pick out the one that talks the most, so that she'll tell the neighbors all about you. Don't worry about that, though. They all talk. When you've moved in stock up your room with about twenty of the drier looking books in the world. Lawbooks look most imposing. Fix up a table with lots of stationery—pens and pencils, red and black ink, and all that sort of thing. Make the room look as if you were the most sincere student ever. And by no means neglect to have a well worn Bible prominently in evidence. You can buy one second hand at some bookstore before you start out."

"I'd have to, of course. I thank you for the flattery. Proceed with the program of the gay, mad life I must lead. I'm going to have a swell time; that's perfectly plain."

"As soon as you're shaken down in your room make the rounds of the stores and ask for work. Try to get into the dry goods emporium if you can. The girls all shop there. But anything will do, except a grocery or a hardware store and places like that. You mustn't consider any employment that would soil your clothes or roughen your lily white hands."

"You expect me to believe I'd have any chance of winning a millionaire's daughter if I were a ribbon clerk in a dry goods store?"

"The best in the world. The ribbon clerk is her social equal. He calls her Mary, and she calls him Joe."

"Done with you! Me for the ribbon counter! Anything else?"

"The storekeepers aren't apt to employ you at first. They'll be suspicious of you."

"They will be afterward, all right. However—"

"So you must simply call on them, walk in, locate the boss and tell him, 'I'm looking for employment.' Don't press it. Just say it and get out."

"No trouble whatever about that. It's always that way when I ask for work."

"They'll send for you before long, when they make up their minds that you're a decent, moral young man, for they know you'll draw trade. And every Sunday—"

"I know—church!"

"Absolutely! Pick out the one the rich folks go to. Go in quietly and do just as they do—stand up and kneel, look up the hymns and sing just when they do. Be careful not to slug too loud or anything like that. Just do it all modestly, as if you were used to it. Better go to church here two or three times and get the hang of it."

"Here, now!"

"Nearly all the wealthy dodgers in such towns are deacons, you see, and though they may not speak to you for months on the street, it's their business to wailay you after the service is over and shake hands with you and tell you they hope you enjoyed the sermon and ask you to come again. And, you can bank on it, they'll all take notice from the first."

"It's no wonder Bartlett made you a partner, Harry."

"Now, behave. I want you to get in right. If you follow the rules I've outlined, not only will all the girls in town be falling over themselves to get to you first, but their fond parents will be egging them on. Then all you've got to do is to pick out the one with the biggest bundle and—"

"Make a play for her?"

"Not on your life! That would be fatal. Your part is to put yourself in her way. She'll do all the courting, and when she accents the psychological moment she'll do the proposing."

"It doesn't sound natural, but you certainly seem to know what you're drooling about."

"You can anchor on that, Nat."

"And are you finished?"

"I am. Of course I'll probably think of more things to wise you to before you go."

Duncan laughed shortly and tilted back in his chair, selecting another cigarette. "And you're the chap who wanted me to go to some bromide old show tonight? Harry, you're immense. Why didn't you ever let me suspect you had all this romantic imagination in your system?"

"Imagination be blown, son. This is business." Kellogg removed the stopper from the decanter and filled both glasses again. "Well, what do you say?"

"I've just said my say, Harry. It's amazing. I'm proud of you."

"But will you do it?"

"Everything else aside, how can I? I've got to live, you know."

"But I propose to stake you."

Duncan came down to earth. "No, you won't—not a cent. I'm in earnest about this thing—no more sponging on you, Harry. Besides—"

"No, seriously, Nat. I mean this, every word of it. I want you to do it, to please me if you like. I've a notion something will come of it. And I believe from the bottom of my heart there's not the slightest risk if you'll play the cards as they fall, according to Hoyle."

"Harry, I believe you do."

"I do firmly. And I'll put the proposition on a business basis if you like."

"Go on. There's no holding you."

"You start out tomorrow and order your war kit. Get everything you need, and plenty of it, and have the bills sent to me. You can be ready in a fortnight. The day you start I'll advance you $500. When you're married you can repay me the amount of the advances with interest at 10 per cent and I'll consider it a mighty good deal for myself. Now, will you?"

"You mean it?"

Literary Notes

The Care of the Cellar.

"The cellar floor should be of concrete, which may be easily swept and washed when this is required; your cellar wall should be whitewashed at least once a year. Keep your cellar windows free with out and within, so that ventilation is possible. Don't pile things against them," says Christine Terhune Herrick in Woman's Home Companion for May.

Partition off that part of your cellar where the coal is kept and put the coal in by a chute. Rail off or box off a place for dry wood and another for the large firewood. Keep your coal in suitable bins.

"Have divided from the rest of the cellar a room for your preserves, pickles, jellies, etc., and fit this room with swing shelves. If this room is not dark, build in a closet and put in shelves. In this same room may stand barrels of apples and vegetables stored for the winter.

"When milk is to be kept in the cellar the pans should be on swing shelves and nothing of strong enough flavor to contaminate it should be close by. The butter may also be kept here. Unless the cellar is thoroughly screened it is well to have the shelves inclosed in wire netting and fitted with swinging doors. Meat should also be protected by netting or be placed in a wire safe. Bacon, hams, etc., may be hung from stout hooks which may be fastened into the cellar beams.

"Ashes should never be sifted in cellar, but taken outside—unless the work can be done in the room devoted to fuel and with the door shut into the other part of the cellar. A covered sifter—should be used, if possible, to keep the fine dust from creeping into the other part of the house.

"The spring is the time for cleaning the furnace and putting it into good order again for the coming winter. Have the pipes inspected then, the grates repaired and all of the necessary alterations made."

ALFALFA

By Milton M. Burnham.

Instructors at state institutes have told us that the food value of a ton of good bran and a ton of alfalfa hay are practically the same and that as a consequence five tons of alfalfa, the usual yield per acre in this section, is worth $125 to the farmer for his home use.

Now reduce this estimate to $100 and reflect on the fact that $100 is the equivalent of the interest on $1,000 one year at 10 per cent. What is your land worth per acre when it yields you $100 per annum per acre? With money worth 7 per cent per annum, an acre of land yielding $100 annually is of the value of at least $1,429. Will you be off-putting it at $15 or even $20 after you have it in alfalfa?

Now the cost of putting a field into alfalfa is less than ten dollars an acre and not exceeding $1 above the farmer's work. The practical question is this: Will it pay to have a cash outlay of $1 in 1911 for a cash return of $100 in 1912 and each year thereafter? The risk is negligible; the almost certain gain is so immense as to be astonishing. Stop and figure out what five or ten or more acres may be made to do for you in two years, ten years or more.

Possibly you will not be able to believe that alfalfa can be so much more desirable than other crops, especially clover, as the foregoing figures would teach us in the light of our experience. Let us see. All careful, reflecting farmers who have kept a cost and selling record on their crops will concede that none of the cultivated or grain crops, if produced and marketed with hired labor will season with season, afford any profit to the farmer—that no net gain can be expected from them considered alone. The good farmer raises these cultivated crops and grains not for themselves but for the purpose of getting their land into meadow. To his meadow and his pasture the wise farmer looks for his profits.

Heretofore the farmer has recognized the clover as productive of his best meadow. Let us then institute a comparison of the relative values of the clover and alfalfa as meadow plants, remembering that the clover are most valuable in a four years' rotation in which the clovers are grown twice in the four years. We will begin with one year of both alfalfa and clover seeded in 1911 and see how the account will stand at the end of ten years as indicated by our present knowledge and experience.

We will put in an acre of alfalfa in 1911 at the cost of $5 and no returns. In the nine succeeding years we will cut twenty-seven crops worth $900; deducting the $5 expenses of 1911 and we have cleared $895, and the alfalfa is better than in its earlier years and ready to go on repeating $100 per annum net.

Now we will put in an acre of clover in 1911 at the cost of $3 for seed; then in the ten years time for it and its rotation crops we shall find we have three years with loss of $1 each, or $3, two years in which the acre plays even—if very favorable, and five years in which it pays $20 per year, or $100. Deducting the $3 we have $97 as the net return of the clover acre.

Now deduct $91 from $97 and we have $6 as the measure so far of the superiority of alfalfa over the clover. But this is not all; three times we should run the risk of losing our seeding of clover, and only once our seeding of alfalfa. Further, without artificial enrichment the land devoted to clover will every year decline in fertility while the land devoted to alfalfa will constantly increase.

INVASION OF DETROIT

Michigan Endeavorers Will Have Great Convention.

PROMINENT MEN WILL ATTEND

Many Planning to Go to Detroit and Atlantic City Conventions During Summer Vacations—State Convention Promises to Be of Unusual Interest.

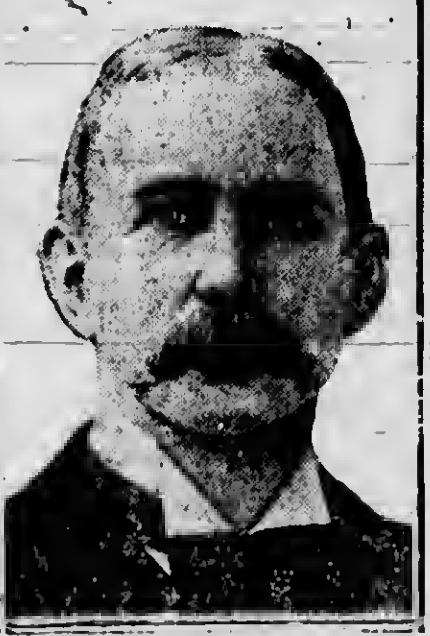

IMPORTANT DATES.

State Convention—Detroit, June 22-23.
International Convention—Atlantic City, July 6-12.

About 15,000 people throughout Michigan are making preparations for the Twenty-second Annual Michigan Christian Endeavor Convention, which will be held in Detroit, June 22-23. This convention will be one of the most helpful and profitable ever held in Michigan. While in past years the convention have been a moral and religious training school, this year all the work will be done in the state, and practically every Christian in Young People's organization in the state will participate. This is a new and bold venture larger than any state convention yet attempted.

The motto of the convention is "Forward," and with this motto in mind is being started to make a new era for the work in your people's work. No only will this be the first state convention of young people's organization, but the state, but the program will be second to none in the country. A very special place will be given to the best and most prominent speakers.

Dr. Francis E. Clark, more commonly known among members of the Michigan Endeavor as Father in Endeavor, the founder of the Christian Endeavor movement, will be one of the principal speakers. For her

REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK.

Clark has not visited Michigan Endeavorers in a number of years, but his interest in the local work is as keen as ever. This will be one of the last times that he will attend a state convention here as he is planning to discontinue attending conventions all over the country, and devote his time to less strenuous work.

Father Clark will go from Detroit to the great International Convention at Atlantic City, N. J., July 6-12. A number of young people who will attend the Detroit convention are planning to extend their vacation to be able to accompany Dr. Clark to the other convention. A splendid trip is assured all those who will make the trip from Detroit to Atlantic City. Special rates have been secured from all points in Michigan to Detroit, and a special rate of $23.50 has been arranged for the trip from Detroit to Atlantic City and return, allowing for stop-overs at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, the national capital, and New York, with a possible side trip to the historic battlefield of Gettysburg.

Every active young people's society in the state is planning to send a delegation to the Detroit convention, and the Detroit Endeavorers are planning a number of unique features to give their visitors the best possible time while they are in the city. The first of these, an automobile ride around the city, touching all the points of real interest to tourists, is characteristic of the city. Another important feature is a trip on one of the magnificent new steamers along the beautiful Detroit river.

What promises to be the most important among the special features is the fact that all registered and qualified delegates will receive free entertainment (lodging and breakfast) during the convention.

Every member of a Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League, Dan Young People's Union, Episcopate Guild or Auxiliary, or any other young people's organization in the state who expects to attend the convention may obtain free entertainment by applying to Miss Mary R. Philney, 107 Colwood avenue, Detroit, for a delegate's credentials. The credentials, properly signed by the president and secretary of the delegates' society, must be presented to the committee upon arrival in Detroit.

WELCOME, SWEET BIRDS!

There's not a bird in the world singing up sweet songs at such welcome hours, you hear the birds. With your singing, the ring comes. You may call your birds of cheer. You may strip the laurel from a tree. If you'll call them to the song. With your sweet, soul-clearing air.

Hark! The lark! Oh, see him under barbed wire into the sun! With a song his little heart can't see his morning partner is done? Welcome lark, sweet, little teacher I shall join your joyful praise. To the God who made the springtime And the golden summer days.

There's the thrush, just hear him warble Listen to his silver bell. Hear the linnet, wren and starling, Mocking bird, in wood and dell. Glad to see you back, dear bird! You are part of God's great plan To make earth a goodly Eden And redeem your fallen man.

IDENTIFICATION MARKS.

Grandma had a habit of docking her hens' tails, so keep them out of the neighbors' coops and cock pits and, of course, get "suspicious and mad as a wet hen" when Sarah Ann Somebody clipped her chickens' conclusions. Must be awfully humiliating for a proud body to become a bantam, for her prerogative is not only ornamental, but useful.

It whistles her feelings. Does she lay a big egg or lay low some sassy henpecker—then her tail stands straight in the air. Is she sick or felled-down trails the flag at half mast.

Besides, it's her steering gear, and without her tail she may sail to a sad finale. The others add variety to the landscape by tinting their tails red, white and blue.

Spring rains soon wash off these autumnal tints; some hen fancier knows.

cently appropriates another's calico colored chicken; then the feathers fly and the millennial dawn gets a setback. My friend, to avoid a punch, buy a punch.

The one in the picture cost 50 cents, and that foot web was marked five years ago when the hen was a day old chick.

Leg bands are most too expensive for large flocks. They must be changed too often to fit the growing foot and they will come off.

That punch mark stays. It shows in a moment the blood line to which the fowl belongs. It records the age. It identifies your stock when found on thieves and may help convict a midnight week writer, and, besides, if your neighbor dares you over the fence to prove your goods that little private mark quick does the trick.

DON'TS.

Don't have too broad a roost slat. Crooked toes.

Don't spend all your profit to win a silver cup. Remember, utility is the foundation of prosperity.

Don't barney in business. While you may come home with a sweetened look you will from others get a sour look. The goods themselves will have a tale to tell, and if they're good and advertised they'll sell.

Don't buy roosters with warts on their face, comb or wattles. Chicken pox.

Don't eat hens with white scle and scurf on head, neck and body. Favus.

Don't cook a fowl with gray patches in its throat and swollen eye. Diphtheritic roup.

Don't dress a hen with dark comb and soiled feet. Diarrhea.

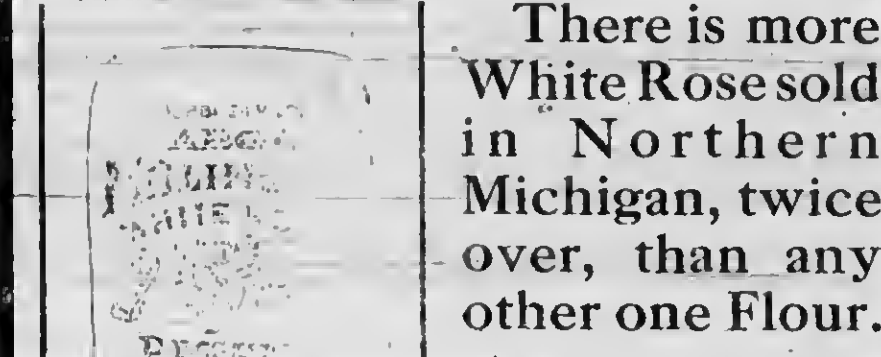

Don't buy dressed chickens with full crops. Waste. Unlawful to sell, crop may swell.

Seventeen Years of Successful Fruit

KEEP TREES IN HEALTHY CONDITION

So They Will Stand all Kinds of Hardships

Frank Smith Tells of Methods Necessary to Insure Good Crop Regardless of Weather Conditions.

Seventeen years of successful fruit-growing and not a year without a crop of apples is somewhat of a record, and especially in the year 1908 when the crop sold for $1.75, followed, in 1909 when the price received was $2.00, and in 1910 an off year, when the price realized was $2.00, this being the finest crop of them all. A good many people wonder how I grew my apples in the year 1910, but it is very easy to understand my method, which is the only one to follow in order to become successful. It is by thorough working; first spraying, then feeding the soil, pruning, cultivating, all of which must be done at the proper time. This must be followed one year after another in order to keep your trees in the same healthy condition as they will be able to stand all kinds of hardships that they come in contact with.

The advantages are all in favor of Michigan, as the springs are generally of the right nature to insure proper holding back of the buds. I don't see why we do not lead in growing the finest fruit in the country. I have grown as fine apples as any man ever wanted to look at or eat, among which were Fallwater apples which weighed one and one-quarter pounds last year, and the weather conditions were against us all summer, necessitating spraying seven times. There is no reason why all cannot grow them if one can.

In order to prove my point I will give you a little illustration of what spraying will do in raising an apple crop. I have three large Baldwin trees and one spray pole is not long enough to reach their tops. You know how bad the fungus was last year, and around the tops where the spray did not reach the foliage was very poor and the apples small, while on all the rest of the trees the foliage was of a healthy green color, very glossy, and the apples large. You could notice the difference ten rods away. We will try and overcome this trouble next year. The experience plainly shows that thorough spraying is a success if done at the proper time.

Much has been said about the western apples and their great success. The western growers are up-to-date in their methods of fruit culture and are still improving. They have got to grow fine apples in order to sell them, and their freight rates are so high that they cannot afford to ship any other. The western apples do not worry me in the least, as I can get just as much for my apples as any western grower, and a little more; and we all can if we take the same pains that the western growers do in their methods of growing and grading. This will be especially true when we can put up a barrel or box of apples and stand back of our pack. When this is possible, Michigan will be the leading apple state, but not until then.

A few words may be appropriate here in regard to handling apples. There are many apples made unsalable on account of rough handling. The keeping of apples depends on the handling.

This is the way we handled our 1910 crop: We used the padded sorting table also lined our picking and sorting baskets. We find this to be a success, and when picking the apples do not pick them with the thumb and fingers, but take a firm hold with the hand and have the fingers reach back of the apple and in this way you will not mar the fruit. The finger marks cause them to rot after they are put in the barrels or boxes. This is where so many apples go to the bad. You cannot be too careful in the handling of your crop if you expect it to keep.

A few words as to the peach industry. Grand Traverse county, its surroundings and location, is adapted to peach raising, and the gravel loam soil is ideal for this fruit, and we can depend on a crop five years out of six; and what is also in our favor, is the late spring, keeping the buds back. They also get the size and flavor, and we have no peach diseases, no scale, no yellow.

I do not see any reason for not setting out large peach orchards. Southern Michigan has made the growers wealthy.

Peaches are a fruit that is easily handled. One man can pick from 60 to 75 bushels a day. I saw a man in Grand Rapids last year in one day haul over $200 worth of peaches in two loads and received his money as soon as the peaches were unloaded, $1.25 per bushel at the car, tree run. The variety was Elberta picked off five-year-old trees, one and one-half bushels per tree. I grew just as good peaches last year as Lever saw at any fair, and I took the first prize on a plate of five. The prize was $3.00, awarded by the Western Michigan Development bureau. I also captured seven prizes out of eight.

There is one thing as to the peach industry: It requires less spraying than any other fruit, but better cultivation, pruning, thinning and fertilizing. There is no fruit tree that you will get quicker results than a peach, and none that will respond more readily to good care. When shipping, they must be picked on the hard side. The Elberta is the most profitable shipper and also for the grower, as they will thin themselves to a good crop. (Continued on page 8.)

BY SCORE OF 9 TO 3

Charlevoix High School Won Its Third Game

Will Play Sirona Nonport Team Saturday on Home Grounds.

The Charlevoix high school baseball team won its third game of the season last Saturday by beating the Harbor Springs aggregation by the decisive score of 9 to 3. From the time of the umpire's "play ball" to the cry of the last man "out" the boys were in the game with the act determination to carry off the heavy end of the score. The infield played excellent ball, the battery Gasikin and Kralik, were at their best and were at all times splendidly supported by the men in the outfield.

Saturday the boys play Northport on the home grounds and if there are any in Charlevoix who desire to see the dear old red and white carry off the laurels and place the 1911 team on record as a winning nine, come out and lend your aid on the side lines. Furthermore the athletic association is almost financially embarrassed and badly need your quarters. Northport is the only team that has beaten us this year and they have sent us word that they are coming over in full force. Come and support the boys.

Eggs for Hatching.

During balance of season will sell at following reduced prices. White Leghorns 50c dozen; Buff Leghorns and Buff Orpingtons 75c dozen. Good stock and fertility. F. Dewey Elble.

IMPROVE FAIR GROUNDS

Many Improvements will be Made by the Association

Will Build Three Barns and Tear Down The Old Sheds.

Plans are rapidly materializing toward the remodeling of the grounds of the Charlevoix County Agricultural association at East Jordan. Director E. B. Ward of this city as chairman of the building committee was in East Jordan visiting last week and on Thursday in company with a number of business men, went out to the grounds where the plans, drawn by Mr. Ward were gone over.

It is planned to tear out the old barns and pens entirely and construct four substantial buildings separately, allowing a larger space around the race track. In the present arrangement the space for spectators is altogether too congested. Three barns—one each for horses, cattle and sheep—will be built farther to the east side of the grounds and a trotting horse barn will be built to the south of the grandstand and near the race course. The latter barn will be 30 feet wide by 50 feet in length, with cement foundation and equipped with box stalls 8x12 feet. All the barns will be uniform in appearance.

Along with the old sheds the present fence on the east side of the grounds will be removed and a woven wire fence put up about 30 rods east of the present fence. This will add a lot of needed room. There is included in this added space a nice little natural grove which with proper attention can be made a thing of beauty.

The new dining hall, built last fall, is 18 feet wide by 74 feet long, and the caretaker's dwelling, built next to it, is 14x24 feet, two stories. A new floral hall, which the management have under consideration, will be built in a year or two.

If we want the Charlevoix county fair to continue to be the leading institution of its kind in northern Michigan, we must get busy at once and fit the grounds and buildings so that not only will the exhibits be properly housed but also that the thousands who come to see them may do so in comfort.

WILL ENLARGE STORE

J. L. Crane Will Occupy Second Floor of Bank Block

West Thirty Feet Will be Used Exclusively for Carpets and Rugs.

During the next two weeks the store of J. L. Crane will undergo many changes and improvements. The west thirty feet of the second floor of the bank block will be converted into a carpet and rug room and will be connected with the store below by a stairway at the back end of the store. An elevated office will be located in the north-west corner of the building on a level with the first landing of the new stairway.

The basement will be used for the same purpose as it is at present, but in taking out the carpets and rugs, gives room for the handling of a much larger and more complete stock.

The new floor space will be used entirely for carpets and rugs, allowing Mr. Crane to more than double his present line.

Mr. Crane has for some time realized the necessity of enlarging the store to care for his increasing business, and in making the changes outlined, will have one of the most complete dry goods and carpet stores in northern Michigan.

DEATH CAME SUDDENLY

Homer Hinkley of Petoskey Dies From Heart Disease.

Shortly after entering his home, 713 Michigan street, Petoskey, Homer Hinkley, well known in this city, dropped dead Tuesday evening at half past six o'clock, the cause being heart disease. He had been in Boyne City with his nephew Representative D. H. Hinkley, in the latter's automobile, and had left the automobile upon his return at some distance from his home, walking to his residence with a friend. When he entered the house he declared that he felt faint, but nothing serious was thought to be the trouble until he fell forward in the chair, and expired in a few minutes.

Mr. Hinkley was born in 1836 in Jamestown, N. Y., and would have been 61 years of age had he lived until July. In 1893 he moved to Michigan and started a stove factory at Brutus, operating this for ten years, at the end of which time he sold out to his nephew, D. H. Hinkley, who was elected representative from this district at the last state election. Going to Petoskey he settled with his family on Michigan street, and has since resided in that city, having retired from active business.

Homer Hinkley was a member of the local lodge of Elks, and belonged to the F. & A. M., R. A. M. and Knights Templars, and the last named organization had charge of the funeral which was held Thursday afternoon at three o'clock at the home.

EAR NEARLY TORN OFF

Roy Patis Badly Hurt While on the Way to a Dance at Ironton.

What may as yet prove to be a serious accident occurred Friday night when Roy Patis and a companion were driving to Ironton to attend a dance at the grange hall. From what we can learn Patis loaded up on "tangle foot" before starting out and on the road proceeded to see how much speed he could get out of the horse he was driving. In the excitement he was either thrown out or fell out of the buggy, and when found was lying in the road in an unconscious condition, with his ear nearly torn off and several bad scalp wounds.

He was brought to Charlevoix and given medical treatment and was found to be badly hurt, not regaining consciousness until the next day. He is now in a precarious condition.

Notice to Dog Owners.

All dogs found without muzzles will be impounded. If not claimed in 48 hours they will be killed. Dogs must either be kept in an enclosure that cannot be entered by other animals or muzzled. Tying by chain is not sufficient protection. Any dog owner whose dog is taken up twice unmuzzled will be arrested.

POPULAR YOUNG

CITIZEN DEAD

Wilfred Newton Chapel Dies After a Week's Illness

FUNERAL SERVICES HELD ON TUESDAY

Was Attending School in Minneapolis—When Taken Sick

Was Young Man of Exemplary Habits and Loss Will be Keenly Felt by His Many Friends.

Death claimed a popular young man and son of one of our leading citizens, in the person of Wilfred Newton Chapel, last Friday at one o'clock, at Asbury hospital, Minneapolis, where he had been taken but a week previous, suffering from brain fever.

The deceased left Charlevoix the 24th day of November, last, for Minneapolis, where he made his home with his grandmother and aunt, and resumed his school work in the high school at that place. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Chapel, had left the city a day or two before for Woodville, Oregon, where they intended to spend the winter. Mrs. Chapel was on her return to this city and stopped at Minneapolis for a short visit with her son and other relatives, before continuing her journey home. The day after her arrival Wilfred was taken sick and shortly afterwards taken to the hospital. Mr. Chapel was immediately notified by telegram, and at once started for Minneapolis, arriving there at 6:30 the morning after the death of his son.

Wilfred Newton Chapel was born in this city November 5, 1893, and at the time of his death was 17 years, 6 months and 7 days old. He enjoyed the friendship and confidence of all who knew him, and his sudden and early demise has caused deep sorrow among his many friends, both here and in Minneapolis, by whom he was held in high regard. His whole life has been one of faithfulness to his duties and respect to his parents and friends, and his death is mourned with the keenest regret by all who knew him. He was a member of the Congregational church and had lived a good clean life.

In a letter received by Mr. and Mrs. Chapel from the principal of the Minneapolis high school he desired to express the deepest sympathy for himself and the school, also stating that during their short acquaintance with Wilfred, they had every reason to like him and the fact of his interest in the church and all good things, and his associates there and good clean life would be of great comfort in their hours of sorrow.

The remains were brought here from Minneapolis, Monday, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Chapel and remaining son. Tuesday at 10 o'clock the funeral services were held from the Congregational church, Rev. H. A. Putnam, officiating. Interment at Brookside.

Beautiful floral offerings accompanied the remains from Minneapolis, tendered with deepest regrets from his former schoolmates, faculty and Y. M. C. A. The casket was also banked with floral tributes from the many friends and societies in this city.

MUST HAVE CAPITAL

Florida no Place for Man Without a Bank Account

Says Writer in Rural New Yorker—Michigan Better Location.

The man who writes "Hope Farm Notes," for the Rural New Yorker is one of the most substantial writers on agricultural economics which we have in this country. He is both an able farmer and a forceful writer. Of late the Hope Farm man has been investigating farming conditions in Florida. He did not go there for a few weeks merely, but bought land and spent a couple of winters living on it. To the summer he works his New Jersey truck and poultry farm. During the past few weeks he has been giving his impressions of Florida for the benefit of Rural New Yorker readers and his warnings are best summed up in the following paragraph, which should be read by all who have a hankering to live in the land of flowers and get rich growing things:

"It would be a foolish thing for a man to come here with a family, spending all for land and for moving. Florida, is emphatically not a place for a man without capital. I do not care what the land boomers or the land agents say. Take it from me and keep away from Florida unless you have a full price to pay for a winter home or capital enough to stock a farm and then carry a reserve. Certain land boomers are offering 'farms' with a lot in the city—thrown in. Let them alone as you would avoid playing with a bad case of ague placed in red-hot coals. As for the strong man, such as those who made up the army of early pioneers, I should expect him to do better striking off into the colder and rougher sections of the country. As for buying land in so-called cooperative companies or buying stock in land enterprises, my general advice is—don't buy it. I have not investigated their land or their prospects but I do know enough about Florida to see the fearful chances of misrepresentation and fraud which are possible in these land deals. I would not spend a cent with any of them. I have no doubt there are 50,000 land owners in Florida who would hop at the chance to sell their land for half what it has cost them. If you want land find one of these freezers and let the land boomers alone."

Origin of Geometry. There is little doubt that the science of geometry had its origin in Egypt. The annual overflow of the Nile wiped out all landmarks and boundaries, and some reliable means of measuring the earth was an absolute necessity; hence the rise of geometry, which means earth measurement. From all accounts the philosopher Thales took the science from Egypt to Greece, where it was greatly improved and carried very near the perfection it finally reached through the discoveries of the celebrated Descartes of the seventeenth century.

A Soldierly Resolve. A soldier, having retired from service, thought to raise a few pounds by writing his adventures. Having completed his manuscript, he offered it to a bookseller for £10. It was a very small volume, and the bookseller was surprised at his demand. "My good sir," replied the author, "as a soldier I have always resolved to sell my life as cheaply as possible. When your back gives out; Becomes lame weak or aching; When urinary troubles set in; Your kidneys are "in a bad way." Doan's Kidney Pills will cure you. Here is a good evidence to prove it.

Mrs. I. A. Slack, 625 Grove St., Petoskey, Mich., says: "Some time ago I suffered intensely from lameness through my shoulders, limbs and across my kidneys. I at length procured Doan's Kidney Pills and before I had used them long they disposed of my troubles, making it possible for me to stoop or lift without suffering. I am pleased to say a good word for Doan's Kidney Pills."

The above statement was given in August 1900 and was confirmed by Mrs. Slack on July 30, 1909, when she said: "I can still recommend Doan's Kidney Pills as a remedy of great merit for kidney trouble and backache. The relief they brought me has been permanent. You may continue to publish my testimonial."

TROUBLES AND JOYS.

The trouble with most of us is that our joys seem to sink out of sight in some inner quagmire and our pains seem to take root on the thinnest soil and flourish like the proverbial bay tree. What is the matter with us that a little irritation today can wipe out in a moment all the recollection of yesterday's glory?

Every word of it. Well?"
For a moment longer Duncan hesitated; then the vision of what he must return to otherwise decided him. In desperation, he accepted. "It's a downy man's straw," he said, a little breathlessly. "I'm sure I shouldn't, but I will."

Kellogg, doing a hand across the table, palm upmost.
"Word of honor, Nat?"
Duncan let his hand fall into it.
"Word of honor! I'll see it through."
"Good! It's a bargain!" Kellogg lifted his glass high to him. "To the fortune hunter!" he cried, half laughingly.

Duncan nervously fingered the stem of his glass. "God help the future Mrs. Duncan!" he said and drank.

CHAPTER IV.
THE 21st of June was a day of memorable triumph to me, a day of memorable events for Radville.

Only the evening previous Will Bigelow and I had indulged in acrimonious argument in the office of the Bigelow House, the subject of contention being the importance of the work to which I am devoting my declining years—to wit, the recording of the history of Radville township, Westerville county, in Pennsylvania. Will maintained with that obstinacy for which he is famous that nothing ever had happened, does happen, can or will happen in our community, I insisting gently, but firmly, that it knows no day unmarked by important occurrence (for it would become me, as the only literary man in Radville, to yield a point in dispute with the proprietor of the town tavern). Besides, he was wrong, even as I was indisputably right, only he had not the grace to admit it. We ended vulgarly with a bet. Will, wagering me the best five cent clear Havana in the Bigelow House sample room that nothing worth mentioning would take place in Rad-ville before shutdown of the following day.

I left him, returning to my room at Miss Carpenter's (Will and I are old friends, but I refuse to eat the food he serves his guests), warmed by the prospect of certain triumph if a little appalled by the prospect of winning the stake and sympathizing a little with Will, who, for all his egregious stolidness, has some excuse for upholding his unreasonable and ridiculous views.

At 5:45 the evening train inched in, bearing the mysterious stranger.
Tracey Tanner saw him first, having driven down to the station with his father's surrey on the off chance of picking up a quarter or so from some drummer wishing to be conveyed to the Bigelow House. Only outsiders pay money for backs in Radville. Everybody else walks, of course. Naturally Tracey took the mysterious stranger for a drummer. He had three trunks and a heavy packing box, so Tracey's misapprehension was pardonable. Instinctively he drove him to the Bigelow House.

Will now and again makes Tracey a present of a bottle of sarsaparilla or lemon pop, with the result that Tracey calls him "Will," who runs the opposition hotel, a skunk and never takes strangers there except on their express desire. The mysterious stranger merely asked to be driven to the best hotel. This is not like most commercial travelers, who, as a rule, know where they want to go, even in a strange town, having made inquiry in advance from their brothers of the road.

Will Bigelow was dozing behind the desk, lulled by the sound of his father's voice in the barroom as he explained to all and sundry just how he had inadvertently permitted Watty the tailor to best him at checkers that morning; otherwise the office was deserted.

Tracey awakened Will by stamping heavily across the floor, and Will mechanically pushed down his spectacles and dipped a pen in ink, stewing the register round for the guest's signature. He says he knew at a glance that the mysterious stranger was no traveling man. But this is a moot point, Tracey's memory being minute if accurate and at variance with Will's assertion.

The mysterious stranger was a young man, rather severely clothed in a dark suit which excited no interest in Bigelow's understanding, although I, when I saw him later, had no difficulty in realizing that it had never been made by a tailor whose place of business was more than five doors removed from Fifth avenue. He was tallish, but not really tall, and carried himself with a slight stoop which took away from his real height. Tracey says he had a way of looking at you as if he was smiling inside at some joke he'd heard a long time ago, and I don't know but that a fairly apt description of his ordinary expression.

He had a way, too, of nodding jerkily at you—just once—to show he recognized you or understood what you were driving at; at other times he carried his head a trifle to one side and slightly forward. He was a man you wouldn't forget, somehow, though what there was about him that was remarkable nobody seemed to know.

He nodded that jerky way in answer to Will Bigelow's "G'devenit!" and without saying anything took the pen and started to register. He had to stop, however, for Tracey was pressing him so close upon the right that he couldn't get any play for his elbow, and after a minute or two he asked Tracey politely would he mind stepping round to the left, where he could see just as well. So Tracey did. Then he wrote his name in a good round hand, "Nathaniel Duncan, N. Y."

"I'd like a room with a bath," he told Will, "something simple and chaste, within the means of a man in moderate circumstances."
Will thought he was joking at first, but he didn't smile, so Will explained that there was a bathroom on the third floor at the end of the hall, though there wasn't much call for it. "I could give you a room next to that," he said, "but you wouldn't want it, I guess."

"Why not?" asked the mysterious stranger.
"Because," said Will, "taint near the sample room."
"That doesn't make any difference. I'm on the wagon."
The only sense Will could get out of that was that the young man was traveling for a livery house and hadn't brought any samples with him. "I thought," he allowed, "as how you'd be wantin' a place to display your samples, but of course if you're in the wagon business—"

"Oh," said Mr. Duncan, "I thought you meant the 'sample room' over there." He nodded toward the bar. "That's what you call the dispensaries of intoxicating liquors in this part of the country, is it not?"
"Will made a noise resembling an affirmative and as soon as he got his breath explained that traveling men generally wanted a sort of a show-room next to theirs and that that was called a sample room too.
"But I'm not a traveling man," said the mysterious stranger. "So I shall have as little use for the one as the other."
"Then the room on the third floor'll do for you," said Will. "How long do you calculate on stayin'?"
"That will depend," said Mr. Duncan, "a day or so, perhaps longer, until I can find comfortable and more permanent quarters."
In his amazement Will fished the pen so hard into the potato beside the ink well that he never could get the nib out and had to buy a new one. "You don't mean to say you're thinkin' of coming here to live?" he gasped.
"Yes, I do," said the young man apologetically. "I don't think you'll find me in the way. I shall be very quiet and unobtrusive. I'm a student looking for a quiet place in which to pursue my studies."

"Well," said Will, "you've found it. all right. There ain't no quieter place in Pennsylvania than Radville. Mr. Duncan, I hope you'll like it," he said, earnestly.

"I shall endeavor to," said the young man. "And now may I go to my room, please? I should like to renovate my travel stained person to some extent before dinner."
"You'll have time," said Will. "Dinner's at noon tomorrow. I guess you're thinkin' about supper. That's ready now. Here, Tracey, you carry this gentleman's things up to No. 43."

I have never been able to understand how we failed to hear of it at Miss Carpenter's before 7 o'clock. That was the hour when, having finished supper and my first evening pipe, I started down town to the Citizen of- fice, intending to stop in at the Bigelow House on the way and confound Will with the list of the day's happenings. Main street was pretty well crowded for that hour, I remembered noting, and most of the townsfolk were grouped together on the corners, underneath the lamps, discussing something rather excitedly. I paid no particular attention, realizing that between Caesar, Pete, Willing, Roland Burnett's suit and the checker game they had enough to talk about. So I wasn't until I walked into the Bigelow House office that I either heard or saw anything of the mysterious stranger.

Will Bigelow was in his usual place behind the desk and looked, I thought, rather disgruntled. His reply to my "Howdy, Will?" sounded somewhat snappish. But he got out of his chair and moved round the end of the desk just as the young man came out of the dining room door. Then Will pulled up, and I realized that he was calling my attention to the stranger.

Will grabbed my arm without saying anything and pulled me into the bar.

"Hello," I said as he went round behind and opened the cigar case. "What's up?"

He took out two boxes of the finest five-centers in town and placed them before me. "Them's up," he said. "You win. Have one."

It staggered me to have him give in that way. I had been looking forward to a long and diverting dispute. "I guess you've heard everything worth hearing about today's history," I said, disappointed, as I selected the least unpleasant looking of the cigars.

"No, I haven't," he said. "I didn't have to hear anything. What earned you that smoke took place right here in this office. Here," he said, striking a match for me.

I had been trying to put the cigar away so that I might dispose of it without hurting Will's feelings, but he had me, so I recklessly poked the thing into the automatic clipper and then into my mouth. "What do you mean?" I asked, puffing.

"Come long outside," said Will, and we went out on the porch just in time to see Mr. Duncan going wearily up stairs to his room. "I mean," said Will, "him." And then he told me all about it.

"But things like that don't happen every day," he wound up defiantly. "I'll go you another cigar on tomorrow."

"No, you won't," I said indignantly and furtively dropped the infamous thing over the railing.

A Woman's Sacrifice.
Three years ago a startling tale came to light concerning a prominent business man in Austria. He found himself on the brink of ruin, and his wife came to his rescue at the cost of her own life. Leaving an overheated room one night, she walked up and down a stone flagged passage, barefoot and with nothing on but a nightgown, till she caught a chill which she aggravated by a series of reckless acts. Inflammation of the lungs set in, and she died shortly afterward. Her husband obtained the large sum of money for which her life was insured, and with this he was able to pull through the crisis successfully. He married for a second time within three months of his first wife's death. This husband did not get off scot free, however. A servant in his employ had overheard the conversation in which the heroic young wife had told her husband her intention to die for his sake. The servant informed the police. Then the insurance companies contended it was a case of suicide and snafu successfully for the return of the money. The husband was prosecuted for being an accessory to his wife's death and received the punishment he well merited.

A Fearful Fate.
The following is a proclamation made at the Market Cross of Inverary, Scotland, less than a hundred years ago:
"To boy! To tither g'ho! To boy three times!!—an'—to boy—Whist!! By command of his Majesty, King George, an' her Grace to Duke O'Argyll:
"If anybody is found fishing about to lock, or below to lock, afore to lock, or about to lock, in to lock, or about to lock, she's to be persecuted w' these persecutions: first she's to be burnt, s'ne sho's to be drowned, an' then to be hung, an' if she ever comes back s' to be persecuted w' a far waur deign. God save to King, an' her Grace to Duke O'Argyll."—Everybody's.

Her Poor Memory.
To Mrs. Hopkinson, a very sparrow-like old lady, her pastor said:
"You must never cherish an enmity, madam, against your neighbor. If your neighbor injures you, forget it."
"So I do forget it, doctor," said Mrs. Hopkinson piously. "But the trouble is, I've got a powerful bad memory, and I keep forgettin' I've forgotten."—Exchange.

Charlevoix, Mich., May 16, 1911.
Hon. Mayor and Common Council:
The request of the citizens at the life saving station, which was referred to the committee on streets, to have their little street and the north end of Grant street improved, we beg to state we have investigated this request.

We find the little street referred to is a private street, really going nowhere. There is no revenue derived in the way of taxes on this property amounting on same and we do not see where the city would be justified in expending public money on this street.

The north end of Grant St. should be fixed reasonably well. There is considerable traffic there to our city property.

Signed: Street Committee:
W. J. Rachow,
F. S. Glassford,
A. WEBSTER.

Moved by Ald. Geiken and seconded by Ald. Rachow that the report as read be accepted and placed on file. Motion carried.

Moved by Ald. Nordrum and seconded by Ald. Rachow that the clerk be instructed to draw an order for the amount of the special assessment on the property dedicated to the city by Nettleton and Bain and to turn it in to the treasurer in payment of the said special assessment. Motion carried.

Moved by Ald. Geiken and seconded by Ald. Webster that the following described sidewalks as reported dangerous by the street commissioner be condemned:

165 Feet—J. W. Graham, being a part of s. 1/4 of s. 1/4 of section 27, town 34 north, range 8 west.

105 Feet—E. L. Bink, being a part of s. 1/4 of s. 1/4 of section 27 town 34 north, range 8 west.

ANNUAL BANQUET HELD

Antrim County Republican Club at Bellaire, May 19

Prominent State Politicians Present and Talk on Various Topics.

The fourth annual banquet of the Antrim County Republican club was held in the opera house in Bellaire, Friday evening, May 19, following the business meeting which was held at 5 o'clock. Music was furnished by the Bellaire orchestra which played throughout the banquet. The banquet was prepared by the ladies of the Congregational church, who are deserving great praise in the manner in which they served it.

Many changes in the program were necessary on account of the absence of those who were scheduled to take part. E. L. J. Mills of Mancelona acted as toastmaster and acquitted himself in a creditable manner. W. S. Nesick, who was selected to speak on "Politics in Antrim County," was absent and his place was taken by Judge C. L. Bailey. William T. Yeo was unable to attend and his place was filled by Representative H. S. Ameron, who gave an excellent talk on the accomplishments of the last legislature.

World peace and kindred things was assigned Judge F. W. Mayne, who made a very strong plea for peace and pointed out ways in which it could be accomplished. He also came out strong in his endorsement of President Taft and the Canadian reciprocity treaty.

Charles A. Skelcher made a great hit with his character songs and stories while Herman Karcher received rounds of applause for his cornet and piano duets.

George Osborn, son of Governor Osborn was present and, when called upon, responded with a few appropriate and well chosen words.

The address of the evening was given by Frank Knox, chairman of the state republican committee, who spoke at length on the spirit of the progressive movement in politics. Franz Kuhn, who was down for an address was unable to be there and his place was filled by P. C. Gilbert, who made some timely remarks on the situation.

The meeting was well attended and proved to be one of the most successful ever held by the organization.

THEATRICAL

Remember that funny old farmer Uncle Josh Spruceby, who for many seasons has delighted you with visits to your opera house? Of course you do. If you have never seen him you have missed one of the lasting pleasures of your life.
